Leonora was singing her last song Rartlett's Chool Processing Meanwhile Frances, accompanied by Mrs. Melville had reached her she had almost come to the end of she had almost come to the end of dressing room. Everything was in readiness. Her maid had looked to the smallest detail. Her nimble seemed coming almost when when seemed coming almost without extention from her grand chest, when nature, which had until now been very merciful and for bearing, suddenly refused to suspend its laws in her favor any longer. All at once she stopped her song, and an uncomfortable feeling ran like lightening through that large audishe let herself be robed—at her un- lightening through that large audiusual silence—at the absence of any ence. The conductor looked up in kind word. But no doubt the hurried toilet she was compelled to make accounted for everything. The last fold was barely adjust ed when she was called. . Without a word or a sigh she left the room, and in a few moments Mrs. Melville heard the storm of applause which greeted the reappearance of the favorite of last season.

The opera was that good old popular Philistine, Il Trovatore, that marvel of melody linked to a udicrous libretto-hackneyed, barrel-organed, but ever living.
