"Any one who will take the trouble to stand on the ice at or below Newcastle and watch the fisherman drawing their smelt need in the citizens and the best wishes a large quantity of large bass, a larger quantity of pound bass will at once account for the scarcity of bass ic the northwest. Can nothing be done to stop this wholesale alanghter of little bass? If allowed to ontinue the bass-fishing in the northwest, which has been a mine of wealth to the inhabitants, will soon become a thing of the past. Was there not a law passed some time ago by the department of marine and fisheries prohibiting smelt fishing above Middle Island, because destructive to the small bass? How then is it that men are allowed to fish smelts as far up as Newcastle?"

The foregoing has a very familiar sound, and it loses much of its force from the fact that it is on about the lines of complaints.

that it is on about the lines of complaints that have been made whenever the bass fishing has fluctuated adversly on the Northwest.
