THE KING OF NO-LAND.

BY D. L. FARJEON.

I.

A WHITE-ROBED WOOD, BATHED IN SWEET AIR.

"Hallo!" cried Robin.

"Halloo!" responded the Prince; and sat him down, and looked at the exquisite tints of the leaves and petals, and then looked up at the skies, and wondered whether the flowers drew their color from the clouds. The lads fell into conversation, and the Prince, who was a cunning questioner, learned in a very short time a great deal concerning Robin.

"So your father is a woodman?" said the Prince, stretching himself lazily on the ground, and peering into a tangle of wild forget-me-nots, whose thousand blue eyes peered up into his own.

"Yes," answered Robin; "he cuts wood for the King."

"Has he got a large house?"

"It ain't a house; it's a cottage. But it's large enough, and better than some. There's a garden, and plenty of beans and taters; and mother's a good un! And there's a litter of pigs."

"Ah," said the Prince, with a sudden and unaccountable interest in the litter of pigs, "and what do they do?"

"They squeak, they do—except the big uns."

"And they?"

"They grunt, they do." And Robin laughed at his own wit.

The Prince reflected upon this information, and not finding the subject profitable, dismissed the pigs from the conversation.

"Have you got woods and grounds?"

"Yes, surely; all these." And Robin made a comprehensive sweep with his arm, as though all the hills and woods were as good as his.

"Is your father happy?"

"There's something 'd make him happier."

"What's that?"

"Two shillin' a week more."

"If he had that he'd be quite happy?"

"Ay, as happy as the day is long."

"And you—you are not watched and surrounded and dogged by spies, are you?"

"No, indeed!" said Robin, with a stare. "I should like to catch 'em at it!"

"And if you want to climb a tree, you can, eh?"

"I should think so! I say, did you ever go birds'-nesting?"

"No," replied the Prince. "Is it nice?"

Robin's blithe laughter rang along the hill, and met the dancing water-beads, which rippled into the stream with it.

"Nice! There ain't nothing in the world like it. But you've got to be careful, you know, sometimes. Some places you mustn't go into; and they're the best! Some trees you mustn't climb; and they're the best! Then you've got to look about you. Such fun!"

"And go elsewhere, eh?"

"Not a bit of it," chuckled Robin. "Can't get such fun out of elsewhere. No; go into them places that you mustn't go into—when nobody's looking! Climb them trees that you mustn't climb—when nobody's looking! Get them birds' nests—when nobody's looking! And run home with them—when nobody's looking!"

And Robin rubbed his hands, and looked about him blithely, as though he were doing all these delightful things.

"And to whom do those trees belong, Robin?"

"They're in the King's ground, but the King he don't mind a bit. He ain't mean enough!"

Prince Sassafras laughed at the idea of this common boy outwitting the attendants, who were always on the watch with dogs and guns; but his laughter changed to sighs as he thought, "Oh, if I might do this! If I might go birds'-nesting in one of my own trees!"

Said Robin, "Never went birds'-nesting! Ho! ho! Did you ever hear the larks sing when they get up of a morning?"

"No," sighed the Prince, "I am not out of bed early enough. It must be beautiful!"

"It's just jolly, that's what it is. Did you ever go nutting?"

"No," sighed the Prince.

"Nor blackberrying?"

"No," sighed the Prince.

Robin stared at the Prince with a mixed feeling of pity and contempt; and the Prince, keenly alive to his own shame, hung his head. Robin gave him one more chance.

"Did you ever get up in the night and steal the pickies and jam?"

"No," murmured the Prince, tears of humiliation coming into his eyes.

Robin, with a disdainful shrug of his shoulders, fell to upon his work, with the evident conviction that further conversation would be wasted upon such a creature as Prince Sassafras. He was making a basket of reeds and grasses, and was twining wild flowers about it to give it a variety of color, and the Prince, desirous of redeeming his character, suggested certain alterations in the arrangement of the flowers. He had a good eye for color and harmony of design, and Robin condescended to profit by his suggestions. The basket being finished, Robin held it out at arms-length to admire it. The Prince asked whom it was for.

"It's for Bluebell," replied Robin.

And, inspired by the name, he sang "Bluebell, Bluebell!" to many kinds of air, sweet and rough; and whistled, "Bluebell! Bluebell!" to the birds and the trees and the dancing stream.

"Bluebell?" echoed the Prince, inquiringly.

"My little sister. Mother says she's the darlingest darling as ever drawed breath, and father says she's the prettiest pretty as ever opened a pair of blue eyes. And I say, Bluebell! Bluebell!" And he sang and whistled again.

"She is the same as you are, I suppose?" said the Prince.

"What do you mean?"

"Why, her clothes, now—something like yours?"

"Something like," was the reply.

"H'm!" said the Prince, reflectively, and with no intention of giving pain. "Bluebell can't be very well dressed, then."

Robin, who was more familiarly known as Ragged Robin, for the reason that he was always tearing his clothes among the briers and brambles, looked down upon his common jacket and trowsers, and for a moment a shadow of discontent rested on his face; but a sunbeam saw it, darted down, caught it in its embrace, and dissolved it. The Prince saw the shadow appear and disappear; and he said aloud, but in a musing tone, as though he were speaking to himself,

"Ah, now I know what sunbeams live on."

"On what?" inquired Robin.

"On shadows," replied the Prince.

Robin laughed.

"Why do you laugh?" continued the Prince. "Because sunbeams live on shadows? I saw a sunbeam just now swallow a shadow from off your very face."

"I didn't see it," grinned Robin.

"I dare say not," observed the Prince, philosophically; "we often don't see what's right under our noses."
