Every one knows the story of the spend-thrift who, happening to bear the unluckily suggestive name of "Owen More," was complimented by a pitter wag with the very appropriate epitaph—

"Owen More has gone away, Owin more than he could pay."

But such coincidences are by no means so rare as one might think. One of the newlymade nobles of Louis XV. was the Marquis of Avantere ("Avant-hier," the day before yesterday). The antagonistic name of Pitt and Fox, a century ago, gave rise to not a few jests as to whether "the fox would find the pit too deep for him." During Lord North's term of office his chief friend was a Mr. Pole, and a persistent office-seeker who haunted both was nick-named "Compass," as being "constant to the North and always turning towards the Pole." One of the haunted both was nick-named "Compass," as being "constant to the North and always turning towards the Pole." One of the French commanders defeated by Admiral Hawke bore a name signifying "Lark," and "the hawke pouncing on the "lark," became a favorite joke with the English sailors. The biting epigram, that branded Napoleon's ungenerous gaoler, Sir Hudson Lowe, as "low by name and nature," is familiar to all. Nor are such cases less frequent in private than in public life. A tavern keeper named "Death," and a pastry-cook named "Pill" were the jost of the Euston Road in London for many a year. The partnership of two lawyers, Ketcham and Cheetham, is still a standard joke, and any one who has visited Western Australia must have heard of the mercantile house of Hogg, Bacon & Fryer. The writer himself knows of two next-door neighbours called Mr. Blood and Mrs. Gore, and two young ladies, warm friends of each other, whose respective initials were C. A. T, and M. E. W. But of all these queer coincidences the most striking was the case of a British frigate that figured in the American War of Independence, which was for some time left almost without a crew, owing to the superstitious terror of the English seamen for the cluster of ominous names which chance had gathered on board of her. And well it might be so; for the ship's name was the Sepulchre, her commander was Captain Death, her first lieutenant William Deville and her surgeon John Ghost! and her surgeon John Ghost!

Among those who perished in the recent foundering of a Turkish ironclad was Osman Pasha, a unique figure in history, as the only General of high capacity developed on the Turkish side during the Russo-Turkish war. His military achievenent was single, but notable. He was stationed at Widdin, on the Danube, when the Russians crossed at Simnitza. With a Napoleonic promptitude he threw his force in front of the enemy and hastily fortified it in a naturally strong position at Plevna. There, with a raged ill-fed, unpaid and half-trained army he opposed himself to the flower of the Russian army, and forsixlong months held it at bay until its battalions were shattered in tremendous but futile onsets. To the last his lines were unbroken and his resistance undiminished in vigor. When in despair the Russians ordered the aged hero of Sebastopol, Gen. Todleben, to take command, the position which had resisted every assault was rendered untenable by a flank movement, and Osman capitulated. His military career ended there. He was a great fighter, and his move from Widdin to Plevna had enough of genius in it to suggest that under better conditions he might have been a great strategist also.

Mr. Chamberlain's Opinion.

No English statesman, with the exception No English statesman, with the exception possibly of Mr. Gladstone, is more competent than Mr. Joseph Chamberlain to speak on matters bearing upon the trade of the United Kingdom. He possesses a thorough knowledge of business. The large fortune which he had accumulated at a comparatively early age is ample proof of his practical capacity. He was a member of Mr. Gladstone's cabinet in the years when that cabinet was a tower of strength to the Liberal party. He has written his name on the British statue book in a lasting way by securing the passage of

"No, sir; but I specs I knows all about myself."

Apart from the question of nationality and old age, a remarkable circumstance to be observed is that "more women attain great ages than men on an average, although more of the latter attain the utmost extent of longevity. Hufeland thus endeavours to account for this important fact:—"The equilibrium and pliability of the female body seem for a certain time to give it more duralongovity.
