

ly the case ; and the effect which such conduct must have on the offspring, is too evident to need recital. Let parents therefore conduct themselves in a proper manner before their children at home, let them pay a due attention to their behaviour, otherwise the master had as well do nothing as attempt a reformation in their manners.

To conclude, by the observations I have made respecting the qualifications of a tutor, I hope the reader will not accuse me of endeavoring to raise my own reputation at the expence of others. It is far from my intentions. I envy no man. But I must again say, that if masters were put under proper examination, before they were permitted to take upon them the care of a school,
