Cottie was silent as he regarded her from the corner of his eyes. What did it mean? Why should he kidnap her? What was his object in detaining her, and was there any truth in e journeying together quite so comfortable. And we are comfortable, this promise of a fortune? Suddenly she remembered that he had stolen the packet, the packet of whose con Cottie nodded. She was pondering tents she was ignorant. Had he learnt ver what the man had said. "I find Cascarets so good that I seemed the chief. Long after nightfall they reached would not be without them. I was morning. As they neared the town, Cottie noticed, even in the excitement of her wonder and admiration for the big city, that the man beside her appeared anxious and preoccupied. He drew his soft felt hat over his brows, and looked from under its brim from side to side with a watchful and alert expression, and once as they passed a police patrol who was cantering on his beat, Sheeney's hand went to the revolver concealed under his jumper, and after he had answered the patrol's sharp questions, "Who are you and whither bound?' and received the policeman's nod of permission to pass, Cottie heard him draw a heavy breath of relief. He led the way to a small hotel in the centre of the town, where he was vidently known, for the hostler raised his eyebrows significantly at sight of him, and, as he took the horses to the stables, jerked his head towards door at the back of the house. Sheeney opened it, though no handle was visible, and pushed Cottiebut not roughly-before him into the dark passage. Another door opened -as mysteriously, and she found herself guided into a small sitting-room. An enormously fat woman was counting money at the table, and she sprang up with an oath at their intrusion; but as she recognied Sheeney she nodded and sank down again as if have never been there,' she replied. reassured.

'That's all right,' Sheeney remark-"Oh, it's you, Sheeney, is it?" she d, with a smile of satisfaction. 'Ah, aid, cooly. "I thought you'd been lagged."

The man checked her by a sign of varning.

"Yes, it's me. Mrs. Brown," he said. with his cunning leer. "Can you put us up for a night or two?"

"Who's the boy?" she asked, staring at Cottie's pale face, which threatened to become crimson; for the girl naturally dreaded the scrutiny of one of her own sex.

"A young nevvy of mine," replied Sheeney, smoothly. "My sister Polly's child. I've come across him by chance, and have had a bit of luck, I've hadopted him."

The woman shrugged her shouldrs with a mixture of indifference and incredulity, which plainly indicated her estimate of Sheeney's veracity
