"I."

We say "I' at every turn in a conversation, and the familar word falls lightly from our lips, most frequently without weight or responsibility. Yet "I" is a distinct and amazing assertion, so that we make none like it except when we say "God." It means that, although a long line of ancestors have united to create and equip a man so that an onlooker can trace the contrbutions of half a dozen people in his habits of thought and trend of temper, in his very walk and appearance -besides the traits of descent too ancient for our identification—there is some subtle quality in the man which has never been seen before, and never will be seen again. It is his own property, and cannot be matched. It is unique in the history of the race. Without this addition he would have had to say "We"; with it he dares to say "I.".—Ian Maclaren in the Young Man
