It was not until nearly 9 o'clock that a message came by telenone to one of the neighbors' houses that the children had just been discovered and taken to the fire hall.

Youngsters Tired. When they arrived home the youngsters were apparently quite unaware that they had done anything which might have caused uneasiness to their parents. They were very tired, deadfact, but they were full of the wonderful sights they had seen, and which they described in detail. There had been street cars, threshing machines, turntables, and dezens of similar marvels, which did not come within the range of their usual home life. They were concerned about one thing, however, and that was that the wagon, which had been provided with a new
