This funny little railroad has its own way of reckoning with the problem of street crossings. There the rail has to be cut to permit vehicles to pass. Here and there drawbridges have been built over the track, which can be raised or lowered at will, but these are considered cumbersome, and not very practical.

A Track Gate.

The solution is usually a "track gate." The most amusing experience on the road with such a gate comes when the in the morning. The Great Dane was road with such a gate comes when the train passes a farm-house. The farmer who would be unable to enter his yard because of the elevated rail, cuts and makes a swinging-gate of the track. When, therefore, the train approaches water, rescued his canine brother, and the farm-house, the engineer, may find made for Mr. Tustin's home, taking the swinging track-gate wide open—in which case, he blows his whistle, and after several toots, the farmer comes out, closes his gate, and the train, which has been waiting, is permitted to resume its speed of four miles per
