equal in numbers to the Persian or Mexican myriads, they would fly like them; and Franc with her infinite resources in men and money, would scarcely be a match for a Landgrave of Hesse, or our good ally the Prince of Buckeburg—for with him the author allows that we have a continental connection, p. 190.

nex+

Mil-

ffer-

e of

can

ty at

los

attle

nces

vor-

hich

758

n ito

Ten.

be-

the

ent

LVC

ain

ted

nd

ve

in

ed,

hal

But our Author, intent to prove the impossibility of resisting France in Germany, suppresses or extenuates every event that would invalidate his Argument. The loss of a battle is confined to the numbers killed or wounded in the action, p. 79, lessened far below the truth, p. 78, 129, every other article is omitted; consequential losses never enter into his account of a deseat; and less the memory and sagacity of his readers should supply those desects—the destruction of men is of no importance, and France has millions of money yet to spare.

But in despite of our Author's affertions, the battles at Crevelt and Minden were great and important actions; the last decisive of a campaign which lasted five months after the victory was gained. The affair of Warburg was one of those many operations during this campaign, which have deseated the utmost efforts of an enemy exerting every