

Courts for decision over a goodly number of years. It sets out authoritatively, the powers and relations of the Imperial, Dominion, and Provincial Governments, with all available references and arguments, and will undoubtedly be in constant demand not only by lawyers and politicians, but by business corporations with ideas of opening up connections outside their particular province. . . . As a digest of the statutes and the best legal opinion on their interpretation, the work seems as full and is as easy of reference as the most exacting could wish."

"His attitude is throughout a thoroughly sane one."

—The London "Spectator" for December, 1913.

"This is an interesting commentary on the British North America Act, 1867, and supplemental Acts. This volume should attract attention in the United States, since it is a lawyer-like piece of work and serves excellently the desirable end of presenting clearly the governmental system of neighbours with whom our relations are constantly growing more intimate."

—Harvard Law Review, February 7th, 1914.

"Very much in the character of such a work depends on the author's point of view and Mr. Lefroy's is that of a jurist apparently both erudite and cautious. . . . The value of Mr. Lefroy's treatise depends on the accuracy of his use of legal decisions, and the care and intelligence with which he draws the line between positive enactments on the one hand and assumptions, however well founded, on the other. In this respect, the work seems to be quite trustworthy, and it is certainly a valuable guide through what, without such aid, is apt to appear a tangled maze."

—Globe, September 27th, 1913.

"While much of Mr. Lefroy's valuable work appeals more directly to the students of constitutional law, it can be read with interest and profit by the class that the professions are prone to call laymen."

Toronto Sunday World, November 2nd, 1913.

"Mr. Lefroy has carried out his intention excellently well, and the result of his labours will find a ready welcome in many quarters. Of the work as a whole we can truly say that it is a
