EFFECTIVE ANSWER TO ALD. CHRISTIE

With Reference to the Work Being Done by the Salvation Army Travellers' Home and the Need of Such an Institution in St. John.

A Times' reporter called on Adjutant Thompson, the head of the Salvation Army Metropole and Travellers' Home, a few days ago. He found the officer busily engaged about his work, but when the reporter expressed a desire to know something of the methods and ways of looking after the cattle and others, who find their way to the shelter, he immediately offered to give him all the information he possibly could.

"Come around here," he said, leading the way from the front entrance on Prince Wm. St. to the door on Water St. where the sign reads "Travellers' Home." "Here is where our most interesting customers congregate."

"Now what can I tell you?" said he. "Of course there are lots of things in connection with our work which would strike you as queer, but I have become accustomed to them and don't notice them so much now as I used to. If you will ask me any questions about our work I will be pleased to tell you all I can."

"I suppose," said the reporter, "that you have some queer and interesting people here sometimes."

"Yes," he replied, "you might say, ever since we started. One night we had as many as eleven different nationalities represented in our lodges. There are Danes, Swedes, French, Hungarians, Germans, Irish, Scotch, English, Dutch, Russians, and in fact almost every nationality has been represented among those who stop here. Some only stay for a night or two, and others maybe a week or more. We charge them ten or fifteen cents a night for their bed, and a small sum for meals."

In many cases, when men land here penniless they go to some of the fraternal societies, or the churches, and are given orders for beds by them, and we collect from the society or the church as the case may be."

Asked if the men made much trouble he replied:—"No," as a rule they are a quiet, well behaved lot, except when one comes in drunk, and then if he starts making trouble he is promptly dealt with. I remember one man not long ago who came in drunk, and was acting so badly we had to put him out. He broke a number of the windows, and otherwise tried to smash things, so that we had to eject him. Not long after he returned in company with two policemen, who asked me to take him back. They said he had told them about the trouble he had, and that he said he was afraid to go back, and he asked them to come and take care of him. I asked him if I took him back if he would behave, and he promised he would, and said he would never take another drink, so I sent him in and told him to go to bed."

There was another case somewhat similar a short time ago. This man came in drunk and started making a disturbance, and I told him if you didn't stop I would have to put him out. He said:—"There's no one here can put me out." I said, "Is that so?" "Yes," said he, "that's so."

"I, here, came to try," and I promptly grappled with him, and landed him in a snow bank outside the door. He landed around there for some time, and finally went away. "A little later in the evening I went up town to order some provisions, and on my way back, when passing a dark alley, my friend of the pugilistic accomplishments, stopped out, and said to me:—"Are you as good a man as you were a little while ago?" I said, "I guess so," and with that I grabbed him and threw him into a snow drift and held him there for two or three minutes, while he got himself pretty well covered with snow, and finally I let him go. The fight was all taken out of him. A few days later he came back to the shelter and has been good ever since."

The adjutant then went on to say that they have men of all trades. One man in particular he mentioned, who claimed that he was an ironworker, plumber and a whole lot of other trades, yet he could not make any money, simply because, said the adjutant, he was not steady, and when he made a dollar, he immediately spent it in the saloons.

Speaking of the numbers of men cared for each night, he said they would average, perhaps, thirty, there were sometimes more, and sometimes less.

One matter that he spoke about, was the difficulty displayed in them by the men, who frequently left large sums of money, or watches, and such valuables, with them for safe keeping. He said that he had handled as much as a hundred dollars from one man. He always gives them their receipt. An account is kept of all articles left with them, as well as the number of meals served.

solid, and everything of the kind that is left for safe keeping, and when they want them back, they produce their receipt. An account is kept of all articles left with them, as well as the number of meals served.

The adjutant is much pleased with the way the work has been carried out, and believes much good will result. These men are rough and uncouth in most cases, but they are excellent chaps for the kind, where there is an institution of this kind, where the men are properly looked after, the public is saved much annoyance which might otherwise be the result.

Adjutant Thompson is the right man in the right place, as his past experience in Halifax and elsewhere, in this work, fits him to carry it out successfully.
