TEMPERANCE.

To the Eater of the Temperare chloronic.

Size, —As one of a Committee of the Hond of Health, I have had occasion to with the district to which I was a sizegard, frequently dering the past summer, and the great number of groups espaine I me with, facelly arrest which they posting in the with, facelly arrest, and the convertion of the powerful and training effects which they produce on the marels and health of the community. I have been confidily usuing the habits of a farger than the convertion of the powerful and the families of intemperate habits; for there where exception have been found fith a contract of the cont

the way of the thoughtless and improvident. It is also said, by our civic authorities that reducing the number of Tavern licences would not diminish the consumption of spirits—that an equal quantity would be drank at unlicensed houses, and that the corporation had better give the license and pocket the license money. If this be true it is high time we had a different order of things—if our city revenue must be drawn from such an impure source, let us add to it at once boldly, and license gambling houses and bawdy kouses as they do in France, for the revenue to be derived from these would be quite as reputable as that from the dirty little grog shops. And so for the sake of a palry £10—annually, a nest of vice and debauchery must be established, to spread its baneful influence around, and eventually add to our poor rates for the year nearly double that sum—pretty economy truly! Shame that our Corporation should persist in receiving such a revenue!

when the public are by this means indirectly taxed at a most extravagant rate to support the City. How much more creditable would it in the present circuitous and extravagant.

I do not wish to trespass too much on you of the city and perhaps may not this and.

I do not wish to trespass too much on you at present, and perhaps may again address you on this subject. I have only to add that I am not a member of any Temperance Society neither did I ever attend a Temperance Meeting and am not therefore incited to this communication by the heated warmth of a partizan, but I make it dispassionately, and from what has come within my own personal knowledge, deeming the evil of too serious a nature to be winked at or concealed.
