What a difference just a few years make; When it was first hinted, not so very long ago that an Italian had invented a scheme for transmitting messages through space without the messages through space without the aid of wires, nearly everybody smiled. Now when a story is flashed over the wires to the effect that Guglielmo Marconi has actually talked across the Atlantic by wireless telephony almost everybody is willing to believe it, and is very much disappointed to learn that the modest wireless wizard has only succeeded in transmitting unintelligible sounds across the briny deep, and that wireless telephony has not been successful up to the present beyond a distance of two or three hundred mids. However, when he says that it is only a matter of a short time before the great feat is accomplished, and we will be able to stand on one Atlantic shore and converse with triends on the other, we accept his statement on faith, and look forward to the event. For he has made good with his wireless telegraphy, one of the greatest booms of wordern exhibitation. graphy, one of the greatest booms of modern civilization, the invention which made it possible to save the

UPIQUITOUS REUTER.

of Tele_raphic News.

What writer has the biggest circulation? You would probably answer by giving the name of some popular novelist. You would be wrong. The men whose words reach the biggest public are the men who write those paragraphs you find in your daily paper signed simply—"Reuter."

An important Reuter message is probably read by at least twenty million people the day it appears. The reason is that it is appearing at the same moment in practically every newspaper in the world.

Reuter's recent little trouble with the London press has brought it very much into the public eye of late, but few people outside journalistic circles know what the famous name stands for. ething About the Great Disp

In a few words, it is a news shop which collects news from the innumerable representatives it has all over the world and se ds it out to the newspapers who subscribe for the Reuter news service.

The name, by the way, is pronounced both "Roiter" and "Rooter."

Reuter's has had an interesting rise. It really began when a German rise. It really began when a German named Reuter, in 1849, bridged a gap in the then new telegraph line between Paris and Berlin by stationing himself at one end of the gap and ing himself at one end of the gap and his wife at the other, and transmitting the messages by pigeon post.

Soon after, he went to London and started a small news supply service from a few representatives on the Continent, chiefly for commercial purposes. He soon hit on the great idea that newspapers might be glad of his messages. So, for months, he went round badgering all the big newspapers. For long he was poohpoohed and regarded as a harmless crank.

poohed and reg rded as a harmless crank.

"You try my little messages," he used to say. "It not matter to me, I make you them a present—if you take my name, too."

And gradually the newspapers tried, and found they could not do without the little messages. He won The Times over, and a huge scoop in the matter of the war between France and Austria made the firm famous.

Though Reuter's is in many ways the news centre of the world, its headquarters is one room, in a small, old-fashioned house in London.

It never shuts, of course, day or night, Sunday or week-day. As quickly as the news come in it is delivered simultaneously in every London newspaper office by an ingenious device known as the "plano trans device known as the "piano trans-mitter," which spells the messages out simultaneously on an endless white ribbon of tape at all the hunireds of places where these tape ma dreds of places where these tape machines are installed.

Cables and wires are mostly, for economy, sent "skeletonized," that is, without punctuation or prepositions. Only the essential words are sent, the messages having to be expanded before appearing in print.

Reuter's, like all newspapers, has made some mistakes in its time. On one occasion it published a message made some mistages in its time. On one occasion it published a message from its Australian representative to the effect that the Hon. Graham Berry, the unmarried Premior of Victoria, has just been made the father of twins, the first being a son. It turned out later that "twins first son" should really have been "turns first sod." The Premier had only been starting a new rallway. starting a new railway

The Coonoor Institute has now been in existence for six years and last year the cases reached 1,240, the largest number ever treated, being an increase of three hundred over the previous year.

The increase is stated to have been due to the special prevalence of rables in Quilon and adjacent parts of Travancore in the autumn. Of the 1,240 patients who underwent treatment 1,207 were treated for being bitten, scratched or licked by dogs, eighteen by jackals, seven by men, three by horses, two by monkeys, two bree by horses, two by monkeys, two y cats and one by an ass.

THE WARBLER FAMILY. There Are Thirty-Three Kinds Found

There Are Thirty-Three Kinds Found In Ontario.

The Sylvicolidae, or Warbiers, are a very wide family connection—embracing in all thirty-three varieties of birds which honor Ontario with their prized presents, some, it is true, in such very limited numbers as to be comparative rarities, says C. M. C. in Toronto Star Weekly. There is a prevailing strain of brilliant coloring running through them; their beauty, indeed, is more a prominent feature, as usual, than any proficiency in a melodic sense. In fact, a college professor, hard put for a joke, well might state the breed to be so-called because they do not "warble." The blue yellow-backed warblers utter but a soft, drawn-out lwitter; the mourning warbler nothing further—than a low, pensive, simple "twit"—their only songs. The Blackburnian variety — the most beautiful of the whole family — preeds in Northern Ontario, so that, except on its passage north and south, we see too little of it is habit to stop off for a week or see ach October's end.

Speaking generally, the warblers may be said to nest on low bushes, although a few, like the Pine-creeping and Golden-crowned thrush species, resort to ground-nesting to reat their brood. Their little cousins—

cies, resort to ground-nesting to real their brood. Their little cousins their brood. Their little cousins—sometimes known as the Canadian Fly-catchers (Mylodioctes Canadensis)—utilitize both situations indifferently. The Yellow warblers—so commonly observed about civilized haunts and prized for their assiduity in ridding the fruit trees of small insects—have a neculiarity of not be sects—have a peculiarity of not being able to forego building in a willow or a maple, if they can find one situated adjacent to an orchard. The tinction — also value — of feeding alone upon inacts.

After the Yellow Warbler — whose name sufficiently describes him—the commonest of the warblers are, perhaps, the Red-start, the Golden-Crowned Thrush, and the Water Thrush or Wagtail. The first is five and a quarter inches long; black, if one is asked to describe him; but the white breast and the ruddy orange white breast and the ruddy orange tint of the sides of the breast and entire Warbler family has the dis-tinction — also value — of feeding tint of the sides of the breast and base of the quills and tail make him one of the prettiest birds of our woods. The last-named is olive-brown above, of a prevailing sulphuryellow below, and is generally to be found near a stream or pond, wading in the shallows, diligently "wagging" his tail with the relish his feed of aquatic insects imparts.

From his appearance the Water-thrush has been sometimes confused with the Golden-crowned Thrush, but the latter never neats or feeds near the swamps and moist ground. Above the latter never neats or feeds near the swamps and moist ground. Above he is olive-green with a tinge of yellew; his crown has two streaks of black enclosing a broad orange stripe, beneath, his plumage is white, while his breast and sides are sooty black—also a truly beautiful summer resident, one can see. If she can, this pretty creature prefers a pine-wood for the scene of her nuptiels. Suppose the five young to have saftly chipped themselves out from the creamy-white eggs that you knew were hatching, although the wooder their kind does not become extinct—till you remember how mother S. S. Steph Fares: including Meals and Stateroom per tinct—till you remember how mother nature, with an eye to that very chance, gives for each of such birds the right hues of plumage to protect it, as well as by directing its instincts

What the golden-crowned thrush mostly hunts for is a nesting site on a knoll, irrespective of direction, where she can cunningly thatch her nest with the needles, so like the ground around. Which explains why she is far better known to most people as the "oven-bird"—Sefurus aurocapil-
