Erratic indeed are the ways of genius—ways which have often resulted in ptitful endings, particularly in the case of men whose works are to be found amongst the world's standard literature. Take the case of Edgard Alian Poe, for instance, the centenary of whose birth, was recently celebrated. Poe was the son of a man of loose habits, and whose habits seemed to have descended from father to son. Before he reached the age of thirty to his intemperance of the famous poet, critic and romancer had cost him several lucrative appointments; and to his fondness for brandy — for that was the intoxicant for which he had the greatest weakness—he added a passion for opium.

In fairness to Pope's memory, however, it should be added that he was intemperate only at intervals. He strove hard to break himself of the drink and drug habit, half periods of sobriety were interspersed with fits of sobriety were interspersed with fits of poverty.

KILLED BY COFFEE DRINKING.

Richard Savage, who claimed to be the lilegitimate child of Lord Rivers and Countess Macclessfeld, rained himself by dissipation, after producing works which have placed him amongst minor English, poets, while Dryden's eccentricity took the form of having himself bled at frequent intervals and eating raw meat. The latter, he said strengthened his imagination.

Both Dumus and Balzac showed no inclination to pass the wine-bottle. On the intuiting habit, hip periods of sobriety were interspersed with fits of reckless indulgence and months of poverty.
