Last week I had a rare experience at an all day meeting. I was convinced that the subject we talked about for the longest time was the most important. More than most important, it is a subject crucial to our survival.

A group of eight of us met for a day — morning, afternoon and evening — to think about ideas for a group of 80 of us who will meet for four days — mornings, afternoons and evenings.

Since I share the not uncommon chronic problem of over attendance at meetings, my expectations for the day were limited. A group of eight church people tucked away in a quiet conference centre 30 miles out in the country? What could such a group possibly discuss that was so important?

Well, we discussed something that has been discussed many times by many thousands of people. The subject is not new. But it hit me as it never has before that the combined issues of over population, pollution and limited resources together create the most serious problem of our time. It is a problem that is not going to be solved without drastic measures. No person on earth can be immunized from its effects if it is not solved.

What happened at that all-day meeting last week? What happened that has not happened a hundred times before when such problems of global importance have been discussed?

A group of eight church people tucked away in a quiet conference centre 30 miles out in the country realized that the future is now. The group realized that "the future is now" is not just a catch phrase but a fact that could be so deadly as to illuminate future futures.

We had all intellectualized the problem before but some of us had not yet fully internalized it. That is to say that the problem moved from the head to the gut.

What made it move? The coincidence of many things some of which could never be identified. But here are some of them.

The price of gold had gone over $100 an ounce for the first time. There was talk of gas rationing. There were homes in the Dakotas cold from lack of fuel. People by the millions in parts of the world forced to live on the periphery of habitable land.

But the biggest single influence on the day was a little book called, Limits to Growth.

How did the book happen? According to the Foreword, in April 1968, a group of 30 individuals from 10 countries — scientists, educators, economists, humanists, industrialists, and national and international civil servants — gathered in Rome. They met to discuss a subject of staggering scope — the present and future predicament of man. The book reports the results of that meeting.

I am still optimistic about the constructive possibilities for the future of our world. But as a result of that one day meeting and the book on which it centred I am slightly less naive and a great deal more convinced that fast, focused action is needed soon. Otherwise the constructive possibilities will never be realities — only irretrievably lost opportunities.

Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Reed are shown after their wedding at Meadowvale United Church. The bride is the former Shirley Tait, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Elwood Tait, of Meadowvale. The groom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Ernie Reed, also of Meadowvale. Rev. Kenneth Jull officiated at the ceremony. Mr. and Mrs. Reed are now living in Norway.

All I really wanted was a cup of coffee. To help me through the next 100 miles on the road.

So I stopped off at a blue barn outside of Listowel, Ontario. It was a huge old barn — once red and catering to all the needs of animals. But now it's trim and blue — and fit for our mankind. To eat in.

It seemed like such a big place — for such a small order. At least that's what I told myself. Because who am I to admit that I'm hungry again — only two hours after breakfast?

"We just baked some muffins," the waitress said. "Good." That sounded just right.

And they tasted just right, too.

"Do you have a few more? I'd like to buy some. Take them home with me. They're delicious."

And before I knew it, I had a bag of muffins delivered to me — not by the waitress — but by the muffin maker herself, Kaye Grose.

And, I soon learned, Kaye's not just an ordinary muffin maker. Or even a special muffin maker. She's the grand lady who presides over the kitchens at the Blue Barn Restaurant owned by herself and her husband.

She explained she saw the muffin recipe on a cereal box. It sounded good — and so she told one of the girls in her kitchen to make up a batch. According to the recipe.

And then Kaye got a hold of one of those muffins. She looked it over. Too small. Scrawny. Not high enough. She bit in. Bland. Needed more sugar. More flavour. Mor umph.

Now it was time for Kaye to get into action. To put on her apron. To go to work — adding a bit here. Taking out a little there. A pinch of this. A touch of that. And presto.

It was one of those muffins that happened to land on my mid-morning snack table.

"Cooking is an art to me," she said. "I never follow a recipe — exactly. I test and try — until I get what I want."

"And I'm always tasting," she laughed. "That explains some of my pounds."

Kaye says she grew up in a gourmet kitchen — even though they never called it that — in her mother's day. "My mother set a beautiful table. A work of art," she said. "Yet it wasn't work to her."

And with her Irish mother, Kaye developed her taste instincts as well as her know-how. She learned her lessons well.

From school too. But not always.

She can never forget one of her earlier tries at muffin making. At school all of the other girls followed their recipe exactly. And the muffins came out — exactly as the teacher expected.

But Kaye's muffins rose higher. Lighter. Fuller. Kaye thought they were far better.

"What did you do to those muffins?" the teacher glared at her? "Did you follow the recipe as I gave it to you?"

And to this day Kaye doesn't know what she did. "It must have been something," she admits. But I just took my low mark for the muffins and went home — crushed."

Kaye insists that no two people cook alike. Even if they do follow the same recipe.

I had to agree with her. For in my day I've watched many a church supper go by. And when the ladies are given the same recipe — say for an apple pie — they walk in with apple pie. But each one looks different. And tastes different, too.

"I think you add some of your personality into your cooking," Kaye told me.

And again, I had to agree. The zing. The zest. The zip. The lively person of Kaye Grose all come through.

I speak with authority. Not built on muffins alone. For we talked so long that it came to dinner time.

And she feasted me with tomato vegetable soup. And pineapple topped ham. And the most delicious bean salad I've ever tasted.

And to think. It all started over a cup of coffee. And a muffin.

I looked at my watch.

I was hours and miles behind. I had some explaining to do. I needed an excuse. But would it hold up? Would it make sense?

I fell in love with Kaye's cooking.

Early care necessary
for eyes

A large percentage of blindness is preventable. Dr. Ellis Schenkin an eye specialist, told a recent meeting of the Lakeshore Lions Club. He said that many eye defects, if caught before a person reaches seven, may be treated and permanently corrected.

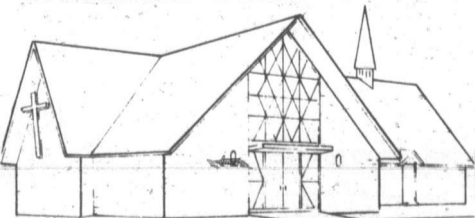

Dr. Schenkin described a mobile eye clinic, sponsored by the Weston Lions' Club, which operates in Newfoundland bringing eye care and preventive service to the people there.
