A BIT OF BLUE ENAMEL

TRADED BY A VALENTINE

"If I could trace my father's murderer, and give him up to justice, I would most certainly do it," she answered. "I hope I am not vindictive. In no other instance in all my life have I ever felt the slightest wish to punish an enemy. But this man—this murderer—deserves neither pity nor pardon. For the sake of money he killed one of the best and kindest men that ever lived. He has two lives to answer for. He murdered my father, and broke my mother's heart."

Marjorie was standing erect now. The lamplight fell upon her face, revealing the firm lines about the mouth, the look of steady purpose in the lustrous, dark-lashed eyes.

All the softness and gentleness had fled from her face.

She was no longer a soft, tender girl, but a woman with a wrong to avenge.

The sight of the locket, which was to have been her dead mother's valentine, had transformed her thus.

If ever fate delivered that midnight murderer into her hands, he would find this slender, delicate young creature a stern and bitter Nemesis to reckon with.

"I cannot wonder at your feelings," said Madeline, slowly. "If I were in your place perhaps I should feel the same. It was an awful—terrible crime. But when one thinks of the penalty the law awards to it—to be hanged by the neck—"

She broke off with a shudder, and said no more.

"It is horrible, but it is just," said Marjorie calmly, though she too, trembled.

"But if," resumed Madeline, after a pause, "nine years have elapsed, and the police haven't been able all this time to discover the slightest clue, it is unlikely they will ever find one now."

"And yet you see I have been directed to this locket after all these years."

"Yes, but what good can that do?" said Madeline, hurriedly and with a slight change of color. "This man from whom I bought it was a respectable tradesman. Most likely it has passed through several hands before it came to him. After all these years, it would be next to impossible to trace it."

"Perhaps so. And yet the very sight of it has given me a strange feeling, as though it will not be long before the murderer is found. I have faith to believe that my father's blood has not cried for vengeance all these years in vain."

CHAPTER V.

The Bit of Blue Enamel.

The next morning Madeline found herself so unwell that it was clear she would not be able to go down stairs for breakfast, if, indeed, she were not confined to her room for several days.

Marjorie constituted herself her personal attendant, nursing her with solicitude, and feeling her heart drawn towards her in great tenderness now that she lay weak and ill.

There was no coldness in Madeline's manner now.

She clung to Marjorie as though she loved her, and wanted to win her love. And very soon Marjorie did love her, for, as Madeline unfolded her nature to her day by day, she found in it a wealth of generous qualities such as could not fail to touch her heart.

Mr. Hyde was deeply concerned about his daughter, and visited her sick room at least half a dozen times a day.

Edgar Hyde, though he made constant inquiries, did not strike Marjorie as being overwhelmed with grief. The doctor said that Madeline was in a high feverish state, and it was concluded she had taken cold while skating.

It seemed unlikely now that there would be any torch-light skating party, as had been suggested, on St. Valentine's day.

Madeline was confined to her room for a week, and although Marjorie devoted herself to her, yet there were times—a great many of them—when she was thrown into the company of the gentlemen downstairs.

Mr. Hyde was extremely fond of music, and Marjorie's singing so delighted him that he begged her to come downstairs for an hour or two, every evening, while a maid sat with Madeline.

That both of the young men admired Marjorie could not help being aware of.

Edgar would hang over her as she sat at the piano, singing the sweet sacred melodies his uncle loved; and it was evident he regarded with jealous anger any attempt of his brother's to oust him from his place.

This troubled Marjorie.

In the first place, she did not particularly care for Edgar; and on that account alone his attentions would have been distasteful; in the second place, she believed him to be, if not absolutely the affianced husband of Madeline,

The diver dies without air to breathe. The consumptive dies without lungs to breathe the air, or of lungs rendered incapable of breathing by disease. The blood as it flows in and out of the lungs indicates the consumptive's progress. As the lungs grow weaker less oxygen is inhaled, and the blood changes from scarlet to purple. Oxygen is the life of the blood as the blood is the life of the body.

The effect of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery upon weak lungs is to strengthen them, to enable the full oxygenation of the blood, arrest the progress of disease, and heal the inflamed tissues. Lung diseases have been and are being cured by "Golden Medical Discovery" in cases where deep-seated cough, frequent hemorrhage, emaciation, weakness, and night-sweats have all pointed to a fatal termination by consumption.

"Some years ago I was almost a helpless victim of that dread disease—consumption," writes Mr. Chas. Fross, P. M., of White Co., Ind. "I was confined to my room for several months; my friends and neighbors had given up all hope of my recovery, until one day a friend advised me to take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and after I had taken a bottle of the second bottle I began to improve. After taking six bottles I was, I honestly believe, delivered from the grave and am now a strong and hearty man."

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets cleanse the clogged system from accumulated impurities.

the man on whom her heart's best love was set, and whose love she had come right to expect in return.

Charles, on the other hand, she liked exceedingly; nay, there was some danger of her liking ripening into love.

His frank, pleasant face was fast becoming the most attractive thing her eyes could look upon.

His voice and his smile had power to make her heart beat fast.

One day she went for a run in the woods at the back of the house.

Madeline had declared she was growing pale with her unremitting attendance on her, and had urged her to go out for half an hour to breathe the clear, cold air.

"There are snowdrops in the wood, Marjorie," she said. "Get some for me, please. I think they are my favorite flowers."

So to the wood Marjorie went, and was looking for the graceful snow flowers at the roots of the sheltering trees, when Charles Hyde came along one of the paths.

His frank, healthful face was glowing with exercise, and bright with good humor. He walked with a brisk, firm tread, whistling a lively tune.

He stopped short at sight of Marjorie, his bright face growing brighter than ever.

"Why, Marjorie," he exclaimed, joyously, "you here? What a pleasant surprise!"

The girl blushed rosily, and stooped to gather a snowdrop that grew at her feet.

How it had come about that he occasionally called her Marjorie she herself scarcely knew.

Perhaps because his uncle, in pleasant, fatherly fashion, had fallen into this mode of address; perhaps it was simply because he was an audacious young man, and liked to do it.

However this may be Marjorie by no means objected to hear it, and thought her name never sounded so sweet as when it fell from his lips.

"Shall we sit down a moment? Will it give you cold?" he said, pausing against the trunk of a fallen tree.

"Oh, no!"

"Have you heard about the attempted burglary at Mortimer House?" he asked, a little abruptly, after they had sat for a moment or two.

"No; when was it?"

"Well, it happened last night. Fortunately some of the servants heard a noise, and gave the alarm in time. Nothing was taken; but, on the other hand, the burglars made their escape in safety. It is suspected they belong to a wonderfully clever gang, who have baffled the police for years. They gain entrance into houses in the most skillful manner, and do not stop at violence—or even murder—if they meet with any resistance."

To Be Continued.

WORDS CANNOT TELL

The Great Good Dodd's Dyspepsia Tablets did Edward Rousseau—of Bruce Mines, Ont.—An Insurance Policy Against Discomfort.

"For upwards of ten years, I have been a severe sufferer from Dyspepsia. I doctored almost continually and used almost everything I could hear of, but got no real relief till I used Dodd's Dyspepsia Tablets. Words cannot tell the great good they have done me."

These are the words of Edward Rousseau, of Bruce Mines, Ontario. They come as a message of hope to all sufferers from Indigestion or Dyspepsia—to all who suffer from sour stomach, bloating, pains in the stomach, headache and that terrible depression that is probably the worst symptom of this all-too-prevalent disease.

This is proof that Dyspepsia can be cured by Dodd's Dyspepsia Tablets. Thousands of similar proofs lead to the conclusion that there is no case of Indigestion or Dyspepsia that Dodd's Dyspepsia Tablets cannot cure. Dodd's Dyspepsia Tablets are an insurance policy against discomfort; they are the surest guarantee of good health.

"SIDE TRACKED."

"Side Tracked," like young Lochinvar, has come out of the west, where it has been a popular attraction for some time. It is breezy and always on the move, like the country from which it sprang. After all, the best test of the merits of a decent play is in the verdict of those for whose amusement it is intended, and judged by that standard, "Side Tracked" will prove a great success in this city. In the course of the performance a number of diverting specialties are given. "Side Tracked" is a powerful yet laughable comedy-drama, in fact, has comedy enough to stock three or four melodramas. It will be produced with new ingenious mechanical effects and striking costumes.

All the parts in the play are admirably sustained, while the comical situations, especially those in railroad life, are productive of much merriment. The entrance of the principal in a box car is realistic and excruciatingly funny, and the railroad scenes in the third act where the tramp is rushed across the stage on the pilot of an engine carries the house by storm.

Miss Sadie Martinot is soon to appear here in Piner's greatest characterization of modern drama, "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray." Paula Tanqueray must last as long as stage literature is read and acted, because she is the personification of nineteenth-century of the women who err through weakness, vanity or love of luxury. The first presentation of this masterpiece of Piner's, interpreted by so fine an actress as Miss Martinot, will be looked forward to with delight by theatre-goers.

Miss Kidder's date for Chatham has been changed. The following letter explains:

New York, Oct. 6, 1903.
Mr. Fred. H. Brisco,
Manager Grand Opera House,
Chatham, Ont.

Dear Sir,—After having given it a thorough and fair trial, I have come to the conclusion that Miss Kidder's new play is a failure, and for this reason I shall close her season in it. This causes me to cancel November 3rd with you.

I am now negotiating for another play, and as soon as the matter is definitely settled, Miss Kidder will fill all her bookings, and I will try to arrange a later date with you.

Please acknowledge receipt of this by return mail, and oblige,

Yours truly,
JULIE MURRY.

Alcoholic Drinks.

It is well known that alcoholic drinks are much more injurious in tropical regions than in the north. In a lecture at Bremen Dr. J. Bergmann explained this as being due to the fact that alcohol paralyzes the pores of the skin and checks perspiration.
