CHAPTER XV.
COMMITTED FOR TRIAL.

"None!" said Mr. Barrington, grimly, and he gave him Clarence's telegram.

"Thank Heaven that fellow held his tongue!" said Lord Coverdale.

"Yes, he has done so—for the present!" said Mr. Barrington, grimly.

"He is guilty, of course?" remarked Lord Coverdale.

"Yes, no doubt, and he will be sentenced seven or fourteen years."

Lord Coverdale heaved a sigh of relief.

"We can rely upon his silence for so long," he said, "after that when he is released, he must be watched for, and paid to remain silent."

Mr. Barrington nodded moodily.

"There is something about the man that convinces me that he is playing some deep game," he said, thoughtfully. "We shall see!"

"You have telegraphed to Naples?"

"Yes, this morning! We shall get an answer to-morrow."

"Come, cheer up!" said Lord Coverdale, laying his hand on the lawyer's shoulder. "You will find the villain's story to be a more vulgar concoction of the ordinary type."

"We shall see, my lord," responded Mr. Barrington again. "Will you come up to the Revels, my lord?"

Lord Coverdale drew back.

"No, no!" he said hastily. "Not now! I could not! It would seem as if I believed this story, and—and were anxious to take possession."

"I understand," said Mr. Barrington. "I asked because I find myself placed in an extremely difficult position. I have been carrying on the business of the estate since Mr. Knighton's death, and it is no light amount of business, and there are notices and leases to sign, and—"

He stopped abruptly. "My lord, I do not wish to press it, but you must hold yourself in readiness to fill the position into which you have come so strangely."

"Not yet! Let us wait as long as possible!" said Lord Coverdale, and he hurried away.

But Mr. Barrington's grave words

THE MISERY OF BACKACHE
Removed by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Meaford, Ont. "I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for backache, and I also had a female weakness. I felt dizzy and nervous, and was without energy. I had to force myself to do my work, and was always 'dead' as they say. I saw a Pinkham advertisement which induced me to take the Vegetable Compound, and my back gradually stopped aching, and I felt lighter in spirit. I am recommending the Vegetable Compound with pleasure to all I meet who complain as I did."—MILDRED BROWN, Meaford, Ont.

the broad fields and well-to-do homesteads—all his, perhaps—he might be pardoned if a wish arose that in some way some of the wealth around him might be his!

The Phaeton drove up at the door, and the servants came down the steps to receive him.

He had not seen the place for years, and its magnificence struck him as freshly as if he beheld it for the first time.

"Mr. Barrington is expecting you, my lord; he's in the library," said the butler.

Lord Heron just glanced round the spacious hall, and with a strange sensation entered the library.

Mr. Barrington rose to meet him with a grave face.

"Good-morning, my lord!" he said; "you see, I have sent for you!"

"Yes; I am sorry!" said Lord Heron. "I was in two minds about coming; Barrington, I wish it could have been avoided. I feel as if I were intruding here!" and he sank into a seat, and regarded the lawyer with knitted brows.

Mr. Barrington shook his head. "My lord," he said, "it is no intrusion."

Lord Coverdale started.

"You have received some news?" he said, in a low voice.

"Faintest news!" responded Mr. Barrington, solemnly, and he took up a paper from the desk. "My lord, I have received an answer from Naples."

"Yes!"

"And it is as I feared; there is no registry of Mr. Knighton's marriage. It is impossible that any marriage can have been solemnized, and—"

He paused.

Lord Coverdale half rose from his chair.

"And you are master here!"

Lord Heron turned pale.

"Poor girl!" he murmured. "But—surely there are some formalities!"

Mr. Barrington inclined his head.

"You have to make good your claim—she can oppose it. I am her lawyer, and—I do not say it offensively, my lord—unfortunately yours. I must give up one of my clients; which shall it be?"

"Me!" said Lord Heron instantly. "Defend her case to the very best of your ability, Barrington; fight it inch by inch!"

Mr. Barrington sighed.

"I do not think any lawyer was ever before placed in such a difficult position," he said, gloomily. "But I must do my duty. I shall advise my client to contest your claim to the last shred. And now my course is clear. It was my duty as your legal adviser to give you the information respecting the absence of any registration of marriage; it is now my duty as hers to oppose you."

"So be it, with all my heart," said Lord Coverdale.

"But still," said Mr. Barrington, grimly, "you are master here, I—pardon me, my lord!"

"I quite understand, Barrington," said Lord Coverdale; "and I shouldn't think so well of you if you deserted the poor girl for me."

"And now you will stay to lunch, my lord?" said Mr. Barrington.

As Mr. Barrington expected, Lord Heron shook his head.

"Not another moment," he said, resolutely. "I was hoping that there might be news of Miss Knighton; that is one of the reasons that induced me to come."

Mr. Barrington shook his head.

"There is no news," he said.

The two walked toward the hall, the footmen and butler eyeing them with covert curiosity.

"You will still remain near at hand, my lord?"

Lord Coverdale nodded.

"Yes," he said.

As he spoke a groom came into the hall and stopped, rather embarrassed at the sight of the two gentlemen.

"A letter sir," he said, handing it to Mr. Barrington.

The lawyer took it and started.

"It is not for me," he said, "but for you," and he handed it to Lord Heron.

"For me!—and sent here?" he said as he read the address: "The Earl of Coverdale, Knighton Revels, Beverley."

Mr. Barrington touched him on the arm, and signed to him to return to the library.

"This is strange!" said Lord Heron. "Who can have written to me here? It is a lady's handwriting!"

added to the feelings of unrest and excitement which possessed him, and he felt as if he did not know what to do, or where to go.

As he passed down the street he heard one of the people mention his name, and it was evident that they were already beginning to connect him with the Revels, and all that had occurred there, and that he was recognized as the probable heir to Mr. Knighton.

He made his way down to the beach and went aboard his yacht. But the deck seemed too limited a space for him, and, restless and unsettled, he had himself rowed ashore again, and set off toward the country, inland.

Almost unconsciously he found himself beside the stream where he had last seen the beautiful girl he loved, and throwing himself down upon the spot where she had stood, he gave himself up to reverie.

A vague hope, that set his veins tingling, possessed him that she might by some chance come there that morning. It was a favorite ride of hers, she had said, and she might come any moment. With the hope throbbing in his heart he waited patiently. Just then she came at any distance would be a delight to him. How much greater a joy if he could speak with her once more, perhaps persuade her to tell him why she had left him so abruptly, and with such a strange farewell.

Once or twice his thoughts strayed to Iris Knighton, upon whom so heavy a blow had fallen, and who had fled from the home she had so long regarded as her own; but they were only fleeting thoughts, and his mind and heart went back to the memory of the girl who had risked her life to save his, and whose image was engraven on his heart.

No smoked endless pipes, and waited and watched, but nothing broke his solitude save some passing bird, and at dusk he went back to the yacht, disappointed, but not in love with her, for with the beautiful creature whose very name he did not know!

CHAPTER XVI.
A GIRL IN TEN THOUSAND.

Two days passed. The rumor that something mysterious had followed the death of Knighton's death, and Miss Knighton had disappeared, was spreading throughout the county, and tongues were wagging excitedly. Up at the Revels, Mr. Barrington still occupied the post of steward and caretaker, with increasing gravity and uneasiness.

A letter had come from Lord Clarence, saying that he was still prosecuting his search, but as yet without discovering the slightest clue. If Iris were in London she had succeeded in concealing herself most completely, and he could gain not the faintest trace of her.

About noon of the third day Lord Coverdale was pacing his yacht, his arms crossed, his head upon his breast. The suspense was almost maddening, and he was just resolving either to set sail or to go to London and assist in the search, when a boat rowed up to the yacht, and a man came aboard.

"Mr. Barrington's compliments, my lord, and will you please come to the Revels? He has sent a carriage, and it's at the quay, waiting, my lord."

Reluctant as he was to go to the Revels, Lord Coverdale felt that he could not decline so peremptory a request, and he jumped into the boat and was rowed ashore.

A mail phaeton, with servants in the Knighton livery, was at the quay, as the messenger had said, and the men touched their hats with marked respect as he appeared.

The horses dashed on their way, and Lord Coverdale sat in silence, and with mingled feelings of mystery and apprehension. Was he the owner of the Revels, and lord of the manor of Knighton and Beverley, and, therefore, free to seek out the girl he loved, or had that Italian scoundrel's story been proved false? For Iris Knighton's sake he hoped that the latter might be the case, heartily and sincerely, and yet, as his eyes rested upon the smiling landscape through which he passed,

Just Folks

THE FRIENDLY WAY.

Oh, I would tread the friendly way, the lanes where children romp and play.

The hearty road of fellowship where brotherhood is found; I do not want the sterner game where life is but a fight for fame.

Not would I quit the valleys fair to stand on higher ground.

There is enough of riches here, enough of mirth and honest cheer To balance all the hurt and pain as time goes speeding by.

And as each day comes to its end, if I am sure I have a friend For greater wealth or greater fame I shall not give a sigh.

A place to fill and work to do, if comrades here a loyal few, The children glad that I'm their dad—all that's my treasure store;

A happy home in which to live, what further has this life to give? And where's the rich man with his wealth who really gathers more?

I would not shirk nor idly stand before the tasks which come to hand, I would not fall in duty's hour, but give up work to those who can.

I would be father to my own, a neighbor in my little zone, A man among my fellowmen, and friend to every one.

Cough and Cold Cure

our Cough and Cold Cure, because it is composed of pure and harmless drugs.

No cough remedy has ever been discovered that will cure every cough, but we think we have one that comes a little nearer to doing it than most of them. We have prepared it for years, it has been tried in all manner of cases and given satisfaction. We ask you to remember and try this:

"A Pleasure To Take"

are men whose "idle" lives, no sane results are giving, who loaf and argue while their wives attempt to earn the living. While men of vim and merit chase around in high endeavor, cheap skates sit in the market place and thrash stale themes forever. They play cheap games for cheaper stakes, in joints where skates assemble, and talk of toil with hose and rakes will make them flinch and tremble. Cheap skates are men who never pay unless through writ or judgment; their promises of yesterday but show what bunk and fudge meant. They spoil their stand-off at the start, they mangle and behold it, and now there is no store or mart where they can buy on credit, their children have to blush for shame, their wives, as well, are blushing, while they, to play a checker game, through alleys dark are rushing. Cheap skates are chaps who have no pride, who'd rather loaf than labor, and smile when chaps' supplies by some more thrifty neighbor. Cheap skates will borrow book of hen, they borrow things and break them, and never bring them back again unless the peelers make them. Cheap skates abound in every town, and rank not by their glories; they hold the shady benches down, and tell the shady stories.
