

The Foster Brother; —OR— The Orphan of the Wreck.

CHAPTER XIV.
A HAPPY HONEYMOON—A VISIT TO SAD SCENES—SEPARATION.

"But they will not know who I am," rejoined George. "My name, Eglington, can reveal nothing, and I shall be careful never to betray any knowledge I possess concerning Kenneth Bruce and their cousin his wife, whom they must have lost sight of long ago. Harry, you are silent. Do you not approve of me going to Ardgowan? Why, the proposal seems to agitate you. What is there in it that should move you thus?"

"It seems so strange, so extraordinary," answered Harry. "And yet—I can offer no reason why you should not go." "You can offer none, and I can find none," said George; "therefore, I think I shall write to Murdoch and say that I accept of the engagement. But can you tell me what family has Mr. Gibson, and what are their ages?"

"I believe there are boys and a girl," slowly replied Harry. "They are Mr. Gibson's second family." "Oh, indeed, his first wife is dead?" "Yes," returned Harry, with white lips, that quivered for a moment with agitation.

"Is there a first family?" "Two—a son and a daughter." "Grown up or out?" "Have you ever seen them?" "I have occasionally. I believe the son has left Ardgowan, but—the daughter is still there. If you take the appointment, do you require to go immediately?"

"Within a month," "A month," sighed Caroline. One brief month, and then you leave us." "But very long," replied George, in a cheerful tone. "I shall be wanted only until the boys are ready for the University, and that will be in a year or two, I suppose. If I feel the situation disagreeable, I shall come back to you sooner. There, dry your eyes, my dear lassie, and let us be happy with each other till the time come."

"That afternoon George despatched a letter to Queen Street Academy, accepting the tutorship at Ardgowan, and a week later the three left Millport, and returned to Edinburgh, loth to quit the beautiful little island where their enjoyment had been so great, their regret being deepened by the approaching departure of George.

The time of that departure came with what seemed great rapidity. The parting between George and Caroline was of their affection; but George was comforted in the thought that he left her in the care of one who loved her still more dearly.

He was to journey by coach, and on the morning of his departure, Harry accompanied him to the inn whence the vehicle started.
