

believe that England has a righteous cause, and that consequently victory will crown her efforts—that the Transvaal Republic, which has been a detriment to true prosperity, a stain on the map of Africa, will be wiped out forever, and when the Union Jack, the emblem of liberty, floats over Pretoria, then South Africa will rapidly become what the Creator intended it to be—a delightful and prosperous land. We may be well assured that the British Government will not revisit upon the Boers the hardship and oppression under which the Uitlanders have struggled for the past eighteen years, but British freedom and fair play will be given to all, whatever their nationality may be. The Boers will have a voice in the government of the country, but only as British subjects. But above all, and over all, in that vast country, will float the banner of the Cross, which ever accompanies the flag of the British Empire.
