A Safe Policy.

"It was my opinion then, whatever that opinion might have been worth—little or much—that it was the best policy that we could adopt at that time. It was only an opinion, but at that time has gone on and that tariff policy has been practically unchanged, in any important respect. It has not become thoroughly and completely convinced that the tariff policy which we adopted at that time, which was a policy of free trade and protection, applicable to all classes of the community, is the best policy of the Dominion of Canada can adopt, a policy that is so simple, so safe, and most unwise to radically change.

"One feature, an especially important feature of that policy was the British preference. It has been discussed a great deal. Some of our friends from the opposite side of the house have sought to minimize its importance, because we were buying largely from the United States, but I do not think that that argument is a good one. Our trade with Great Britain under the British preference have grown from twenty-nine million in 1897 to thirty-five million in 1900, and it is now over 50 per cent, and it is no answer to the argument that that company, which is one of the very largest factories in Canada, and one of the largest consumers of farm produce in Canada, consuming, I believe—I speak subject to correction—40 carloads of farm produce per day, this institution manufactures in the Town of Peterboro largely for export, and is the best possible kind of factory for us to have. It takes the farm produce; it grinds it up, ships it to foreign countries, collects the money, brings it back and it goes into circulation. We can

"We succeeded—the country succeeded entirely. We are sending those products to Great Britain now, to a great, stable, safe, free market, from which we have never been excluded, a market that is improving all the time, a market in which we are finding fresh extensions and fresh points of advantage every year. What do we propose to do? We propose to ship our

On this side of the house or on the other side of the house finds that the farmers of his constituency are not getting fairly treated in the matter of prices, may I ask what that gentleman will do? May I as what his remedy will be? May I ask how he is going to apply that remedy, if he has any? I do not know what the remedy will be. The head office of our trust will be in Chicago or New York; it will be outside of our jurisdiction, and there is only one thing we could do, just one
