

The Common Housefly (Musca domestica)

The common housefly is a pest of man and animals. It is a dipterous insect, with a body covered with grey hairs. The wings are transparent and veined. The legs are long and jointed. The head is large and rounded, with large compound eyes. The mouthparts are adapted for sucking and biting. The housefly is a common pest in warm climates, and it is a nuisance to humans and animals alike. It is a vector for many diseases, and it is a pest of food and other substances. The housefly is a member of the family Muscidae, and it is one of the most common insects in the world.

The housefly is a pest of man and animals. It is a dipterous insect, with a body covered with grey hairs. The wings are transparent and veined. The legs are long and jointed. The head is large and rounded, with large compound eyes. The mouthparts are adapted for sucking and biting. The housefly is a common pest in warm climates, and it is a nuisance to humans and animals alike. It is a vector for many diseases, and it is a pest of food and other substances. The housefly is a member of the family Muscidae, and it is one of the most common insects in the world.

- Actias lun
- Address c
- Club
- Andrena v
- Anisoptery
- Annual Ac
- " Mo
- "
- "
- " Be
- Antheræ p
- Apis mellif
- Aræocerus
- Army Wor
- Artemia m
- " Sa

- Bee-killer .
- Bee-moth .
- Bethune, R
- Black Swall
- Blistering B
- Bombyx Hu
- Branchipus
- "

- Bruchus obs
- " pict
- " pisi
- " scut
- " sp.
- Buprestis spl
- Butalis cerea

- Cabbage butt
- Calandra oryz
- Caloptenus fe
- Calopteron re
- Cantharis ves
- "

- Centennial Ex
- " Ex

- Corydalis corn
- Cynthia cardui
- Cystodemus a
- "
- "
- "