

Workers march--without student support

By DAVE SIMMS

A spokesperson for the Fredericton and District Labour Council and the leadership of the University of New Brunswick students' union is weak, lacking in organization and negative,"

Province labour federation vice-president Phil Booker made the comment during a press conference after the labour council's meeting Tuesday to prepare for yesterday's Day of Protest.

As The Brunswick went to press early Thursday, activities had begun for the country-wide demonstration called by the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC) in opposition to the federal government's wage and price controls.

Booker held UNB's student leaders responsible for the students' lack of support for the workers' protest. He said students in other parts of Canada represent one of the most militant segments of society and drew attention to the number of Université de Moncton students who expressed had enough of protest marches." When asked why no student had attended the meeting,

Booker said student and labor unions should work together since many of their grievances with the federal program are similar. He said students need changes in student aid legislation to compensate for rising costs of education and argued sometimes being hit with rising tuition while their wages remain flat is a restriction on their right to benefit monetarily from education.

Jim Smith made a reference to Booker's comments when connected to telephone by The Brunswick and informed of the labor official's comments.

Smith said the lack of participation was not a sign of weakness but an indication that students are "much more mature in their approach to economic problems." He said Booker was wrong to say that students are among the most militant in Canadian society because labor would have had the same lack of response and support from Mount Allison University or Acadia University.

Smith said student leaders have been more concerned with problems within their own government. He said those leaders have been working as part of a "team of students" to see that his efforts were made without the help of labor.

Smith declined to say whether he was in favor of the protest because he didn't have enough information to make such a judgment. He said he opposed the idea of a Conservative government introducing the restraint program after campaigning in opposition to the same proposal when it was put forward by the Conservative party.

Booker also criticized radio station CFRA for airing a newscast item about 1,300 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), which represents 390 government general labor and maintenance workers who did not participate in the protest. He said the item was volunteered by an unauthorized member of the union and that the radio station refused to air a correction issued by the president of the local CUPE.

Booker said the station refused to air the correction and "this is what we come to expect from 2nd. Party (the station's manager) and his boys."

A member of the news staff at CFNB, Hugh Collier, said Booker's charges were partly true when conducted by The Brunswick.

Collier said there was no formal phone call to his supervisor for the division or the CUPE local which represented highway workers. The supervisor said they would not be supporting the protest and the station ran the story in that context.

Collier said CFNB had run a story two weeks before saying that local CUPE local 1390 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), which represents 390 government general labor and maintenance workers would not participate in the protest. He said the item was volunteered by an unauthorized member of the union and that the radio station refused to air a correction issued by the president of the local CUPE.

Booker said the station refused to air the correction and "this is what we come to expect from 2nd. Party (the station's manager) and his boys."

A member of the news staff at CFNB, Hugh Collier, said Booker's charges were partly true when conducted by The Brunswick.

Collier said there was no formal phone call to his supervisor for the division or the CUPE local which represented highway workers. The supervisor said they would not be supporting the protest and the station ran the story in that context.

Collier said CFNB had run a story two weeks before saying that local CUPE local 1390 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), which represents 390 government general labor and maintenance workers would not participate in the protest. He said the item was volunteered by an unauthorized member of the union and that the radio station refused to air a correction issued by the president of the local CUPE.

Collier said there was no formal phone call to his supervisor for the division or the CUPE local which represented highway workers. The supervisor said they would not be supporting the protest and the station ran the story in that context.

Collier said CFNB had run a story two weeks before saying that local CUPE local 1390 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), which represents 390 government general labor and maintenance workers would not participate in the protest. He said the item was volunteered by an unauthorized member of the union and that the radio station refused to air a correction issued by the president of the local CUPE.

Collier said there was no formal phone call to his supervisor for the division or the CUPE local which represented highway workers. The supervisor said they would not be supporting the protest and the station ran the story in that context.

Collier said CFNB had run a story two weeks before saying that local CUPE local 1390 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), which represents 390 government general labor and maintenance workers would not participate in the protest. He said the item was volunteered by an unauthorized member of the union and that the radio station refused to air a correction issued by the president of the local CUPE.

Collier said there was no formal phone call to his supervisor for the division or the CUPE local which represented highway workers. The supervisor said they would not be supporting the protest and the station ran the story in that context.

Collier said CFNB had run a story two weeks before saying that local CUPE local 1390 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), which represents 390 government general labor and maintenance workers would not participate in the protest. He said the item was volunteered by an unauthorized member of the union and that the radio station refused to air a correction issued by the president of the local CUPE.

Collier said there was no formal phone call to his supervisor for the division or the CUPE local which represented highway workers. The supervisor said they would not be supporting the protest and the station ran the story in that context.

Collier said CFNB had run a story two weeks before saying that local CUPE local 1390 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), which represents 390 government general labor and maintenance workers would not participate in the protest. He said the item was volunteered by an unauthorized member of the union and that the radio station refused to air a correction issued by the president of the local CUPE.

Collier said there was no formal phone call to his supervisor for the division or the CUPE local which represented highway workers. The supervisor said they would not be supporting the protest and the station ran the story in that context.

Collier said CFNB had run a story two weeks before saying that local CUPE local 1390 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), which represents 390 government general labor and maintenance workers would not participate in the protest. He said the item was volunteered by an unauthorized member of the union and that the radio station refused to air a correction issued by the president of the local CUPE.

Collier said there was no formal phone call to his supervisor for the division or the CUPE local which represented highway workers. The supervisor said they would not be supporting the protest and the station ran the story in that context.

the
brunswickan

1 ISSUE 6 / 28 PAGES

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 15 / FREE