Passports in Turkey. Before visiting Turkey one gets an exaggerated impression of the strictness of the passport regulations, but in reality they are nothing more than another device for raising revenue.

To explain this I just mention that before travelling in Turkey one must get a license (tezkereh), costing about five shillings and sixpence, which has to be visited at various places en route, and for each visa a fee is demanded.

If one proceeds without a visa a fine is soon or later extracted from one. In order to stop people travelling without a license a police official examines and enters in a book the particulars of all passengers by train; if any one is found with a tezkereh he is removed from the train and fined, but it is only on the trains that any supervision is exercised. On the caravan roads one is never asked, so that if one wanted to travel un- known to the Government it would only be necessary to go by road.—From the Wide World Magazine.

A New York man who ate 60 buckwheat cakes and two pounds of sausage said he would have done better if he'd been hungry.

An Interesting Departure. An interesting departure is being made by the builders of electrical locomotives in the manner of mounting the motors. Heretofore it has been the custom to place the motors directly on the axles, but now they are located above the axles, thus raising the centre of gravity and reducing the strains and shocks to which the tracks and roadbed have heretofore been subjected.

Free Gas Lamps

What does this proposition mean to the Hamilton store man? It means a complete saving in the cost of fixtures. It means no outlay for mantel renewals or for cleaning. It means a money for lighting bills and it means a much more attractive place of business.

ENTERTAINING A KING King Edward is the ideal guest. Of this there is no doubt among those whose privilege it has been to act as his host for even the briefest space of time. He is considerate to a degree, and never allows his kindly rank to be unduly emphasized when paying a visit.

There are, of course, certain well-defined laws of etiquette that have to be observed when the King honors any of his subjects with a visit. In the first place a list of those whom it is proposed to invite to meet his Majesty must be submitted to him through his private secretary for his approval. The King scrutinizes this list most carefully and often draws his pen through names of people whom he has for one reason or another no desire to meet. It is well understood, of course, by those who are to act as the King's hosts that there is no slur, real or implied, against those the King so taboos. They may stand high in his estimation and be "commanded" to all the various Court functions and may even be on terms of personal friendship with his Majesty.

When the Queen proposes to accompany the King on one of his visits similar lists are submitted to her Majesty, and it may be that either the King or the Queen will add to the lists the names of one or two of those whom it is especially desired should be invited. Invitations are, of course, at once dispatched to these.

AN INCOGNITO. It is tacitly understood that these visits of the King are quite private, and that for a few days he desires to lay aside his robes of monarchy and to be treated merely as a distinguished guest. No particular ceremony is therefore observed. His host, of course, meets him at the railway station should he be arriving by train or at the entrance of his house should—as is usually the case at the present time—the King travel by motor car. The hostess, of course, receives the King in her drawing room in the ordinary course of the day, and proceeds with his Majesty's departure.

In order to give his host and hostess as little trouble as possible the King makes it a rule never to be accompanied by more than one query upon these private visits, and the Queen similarly limits herself with regard to her ladies in waiting, the Hon. Miss Charlotte Knollys being as a general rule her sole companion.

It is the query whom the host consults as to his Majesty's desires and the most suitable entertainments to offer him, and he acts as a medium between his Majesty and his host. His bedroom is placed as near as possible to the private apartments designed for the King's accommodation so that he may be in instant communication with his Majesty should his presence be desired.

His Majesty expects his incognito to be most strictly observed during these visits and none of the guests may address him by his title; "sir" is the proper mode of addressing or announcing him and "madam" suffices in the case of the Queen. No one, however, it is well understood, may speak to the King or Queen without being first addressed by them. Both their Majesties, however, make it an invariable rule to set everyone at their ease the moment they enter a house and always aim at making the conversation general. It is necessary, of course, to rise, at the entrance of his Majesty and to wait until he given the signal for those present to resume their seats. This is, however, practically the only formality that is observed.

"GOD BLESS HIM." At dinner, of course, no toasts are drunk. It is customary for the King to take wine with the host and hostess and such other guests as it is his desire especially to honor. If the host be a member of either service, however, it is usual for him to rise and give the toast to his Majesty in the usual naval and military fashion: "Ladies and gentlemen, the King! God bless him!"

The King is a very early-riser when spending week-ends out of town, and it is necessary for his host to be astir betimes. His Majesty takes a cup of coffee and a roll or something equally light in his room, and then if the weather be favorable sets off accompanied by his favorite fox terrier for a walk in the grounds. His Majesty has a great love for horticulture and enjoys a chat with the gardeners at their work. He looks for his host to be in attendance with him during those early-morning strolls.

DISCOURAGES WOMAN GUNNERS. In these latter days the King's favorite outdoor amusement next to racing is shooting.

His Majesty enjoys the presence of the ladies of the party at luncheon during a shoot, and when leaving for the covert usually intimates to his hostess that he hopes to have the pleasure of her company at lunch. Strangely enough, however, the King strongly disapproves of the presence of ladies while shooting is going forward. When shooting is impossible it is often a matter of perplexity for the King's host to find something that shall entertain his Majesty and serve to pass away the time pleasantly. Latterly it has become the fashion to take the King by motor to other interests in the neighborhood or other interest in the neighborhood.

The evenings are almost invariably given up to music and cards. Though nothing of a musician himself the King keenly appreciates the good music and is a critic of no mean ability. He is, of course, an expert bridge-player, and rarely a night passes wherever he may be visited, but has at least one rubber. It is necessary, therefore, when selecting the guests for a house party, to meet the King to include in it sufficient card-players of ability to give his Majesty a good game.

His last action before he leaves the house is to call for the host's visitors' book, which he signs and hands to the hostess with his thanks for the entertainment that has been afforded him. He is also ready to give his autograph to any of his fellow guests who may desire it.
