A Child of Sorrow.

CHAPTER IV.

She did not know, could not see him, as he stood before his glass looking at the little, plain bracelet and pondering over her.

The girls came down to breakfast in excellent spirits, but Mr. Carrington was not so cheerful. He had seen by the Stock and Share list in the morning paper that certain shares in which he had small dealings had gone down, and his brow was lined with that expression of care which is peculiar to the face of the speculator.

After breakfast the girls went out and changed the cheque and made some purchases, and after a prolonged fight Maida succeeded in buying some presents as she had intended. In the afternoon Maida went out again to get some music—she was always hunting among the works of the classical composers for some melody which she could utilize as an accompaniment for her recitations. She went alone—for Carrie had an afternoon of dress-making and millinery before her, and she was humming happily over her work, surrounded by a chaos of silk and satin, lace and chiffon, when a knock came to the door and the lodging-house servant looked in, and, rubbing her cheek with her sooty finger, said:

"A gentleman to see you, miss."

Half an hour earlier Heroncourt had leaned against the mantel-shelf in his sitting-room, a cigarette in his lips, his eyes bent thoughtfully on the bracelet in his hand. He was asking himself whether he should send the thing by post, with his compliments, or—take it to his own; he remembered the address she had given him for the cabman. Of course he knew very well what he ought to do. The thing ought to go by post; he had no right to intrude upon her. She had shown him very plainly by her manner last night that she would not welcome any such intrusion; and yet he was conscious of the strongest desire to see her again. After all, it would be only common courtesy—the courtesy due to a lady from a gentleman—to call and ask whether she had really hurt from the violence and the shock she had suffered. He began to picture the lovely face, the deep grey eyes as they had smiled at him when he parted, the sudden gentleness of the marvellous voice—and, of course, he decided to go, and tried to persuade himself that he was doing the right thing.

So he got a cab and had himself driven to Coleridge Street, Bloomsbury was once the abode of wealth and fashion; it is no longer so. It is the most respectable of localities; but it must be admitted that it is somewhat seedy and dull-looking. And Coleridge Street is by no means the brightest of its thoroughfares. There is no sign of poverty in the exterior of the houses, but they look rather dreary in their long rows, all of one cut-and-dried pattern, and each hinting of better days. It seemed a most inappropriate house for so beautiful a girl; but Heroncourt, though he was by no means poetical, remembered vaguely that some flowers, even the rarest and most beautiful, flourish best in lowly places.

He rang the bell at No. 23, and Sarah, the servant, appeared after a somewhat long interval, opening the door hurriedly and wiping her hands, quite ineffectually, on her grimy apron. There was a smudge across her forehead and two on her chin, the marks of a recent encounter with the parlour grate, and she greeted Heroncourt with a hurried and staccato:

"We don't want any to-day, thank you—"

Then she stopped, gazed at him with bulging eyes and drooping under-lip, and exclaimed "Oh!" for gentlemen of Heroncourt's appearance were not frequent visitors in Coleridge Street; and there was something in his bearing, to say nothing of his clothes, for which Baxter was answerable, that struck the simple maid-of-all work with awe.

It must be admitted that Heroncourt was rather taken aback by her greeting, but he repressed a smile and asked, bravely enough, if Miss Carrington were at home.

If she had been less flurried, Sarah would have said "no"; but remembering that Carrie was in, and, if the truth must be told, being loath to let so brilliant a visitor go away unsatisfied, she replied in the affirmative.

Heroncourt put his hand in his pocket for his card-case, but he had left it at home in another coat, and as Sarah did not seem to require his name, he followed her up the stairs in silence. It was about tea-time, and a gentleman on the third floor was taking kippers with his, so that a fine, but somewhat obtrusive odor of herrings permeated the establishment.

Heroncourt could not help noticing the worn stair-carpet, the stained wall-paper, the general air which indicated the effort of making both ends meet; and he thought again of the exquisite flower in the lovely and shady place.

Having announced him, Sarah still staring with all her might and main, and breathless with excitement, shut the door upon him so suddenly as to almost push him into the room and bounded down-stairs at the risk of her neck to tell her mistress, the landlady, that "Oh, Lor', ma'am, there's gent, a regular swell, gone up to the Carringtons!"

Most men would have been embarrassed by so precipitate an entrance; but Heroncourt seldom lost his self-possession, and, just managing to save his hat, which had been impelled by Sarah's sudden closing of the door, he bowed calmly enough to Carrie, who had risen and was gazing at him with a surprise that almost equalled Sarah's. Be sure that her quick eyes took in the points which had moved Sarah to awe. She arose, and still holding her scissors, regarded him waiting.

"I beg your pardon," said Heroncourt. "I asked to see Miss Carrington."

"Oh, you mean my sister," said Carrie, thinking, as she spoke, how deep and yet musical a voice the visitor had, and that, somehow, it was as "distinguished" as his appearance. Carrie had all the girl's liking for good-looking men, and she was struck, though Maida had not been, by the prepossessing character of Heroncourt's face.

"Your sister?" he said. "I mean the Miss Carrington who played—recited—at Lady Glassbury's last night."

Of course Carrie at once guessed who he was—for notwithstanding her reputation for practicality, she was as romantic as most girls of her age, and was quite willing to jump to the belief that this tall, aristocratic gentleman was the hero of Maida's adventure.

"Yes, that is my sister," she said, with her frank eagerness. "Were you there? Did you hear her? Did you like—"

She checked herself, and bit her lip.

"Yes, I heard her," said Heroncourt, promptly, to spare her embarrassment, "and I liked, admired, her."

"I suppose that it was a very great success last night, then?" she said.

"Very great," he assented.

Without making a mental inventory of the room and its contents, indeed, without seeming to move his eyes from the girl's face, he saw that though the room and the furniture was comfortable enough, they indicated that poverty which is qualified as "genteel." As he looked at Carrie he felt that she loved her sister and was proud of her.

"Yes, Miss Carrington created a furor, as it is called. It was impossible to remain unmoved; and we were all carried out of ourselves for the time. Your sister has a great future before her, Miss—"

"Carrie," said Carrie, beaming at him. "Oh, how nice it is to hear it said by someone who was there to hear! Of course," throwing her hair back, "we know it at home. If you heard her, playing and reciting when she is alone with only me to listen to her, you would think her still greater than you do."

"I've no doubt," he said. "A large and sometimes stupid audience would always be a check and embarrassment; but, as I said, your sister's future must be a very great one, Miss Carrington."

There was a pause, and Carrie, while apparently busy with her scissors, ran over him out of the corner of her eyes; and the more she saw of him the more she liked him.

"But I ought to tell you without any further delay why I presumed to call upon Miss Carrington this afternoon. You may be aware that she had the misfortune to lose her bracelet last night?"

Carrie's lips expanded with a grin, revealing her white, even teeth.

"That's a nice, modest way of putting it," she said. "Oh, she told me all about it: how the man stole her bracelet; how you came up at the critical moment—like the hero in a novel—and how she—she—"

There was no resisting the mischievous smile in the girl's eyes, and Heroncourt laughed shortly but rather ruefully.

"Yes," he said, "I lost my head and made a fool of myself. I was going to say that I don't often do it—lose my head, I mean—but Miss Carrington called out as if she were hurt—as she was—and—"

Carrie's eyes glowed and she nodded at him approvingly.

"And you knocked the man down. Quite right! So should I have done if I had been a man and had been there; but of course Maida went for you. She naturally would, as you'd know if you knew her. She's got a heart as tender as—as a piece of putty. She'd let anyone rob her and hit him hard, didn't you?"

"I'm afraid so," admitted Heroncourt. "But I was very sorry for it, as I told her; and she was gracious enough to forgive me."

"Oh, yes, she'd forgive you," remarked Carrie. "She'd forgive a red Indian for scalping her."
