The Heir to Beecham Park

CHAPTER XIX.

Lord Court bent his head, and pressed his lips to hers; then, lifting her tenderly, he bore her to the couch, and laid her once more on the pillows.

"You are very frail, Margery," he said, kindly, contemplating her as she lay back wearily; "but now you must make great efforts to get well, and you shall soon go out and feel the sea breezes on your cheeks—perhaps they will bring a little color to them."

"I am always pale," she whispered, in reply. "How long have I been ill?"

"A month now. Ah, I had almost begun to despair—you were so long recovering."

"And—and Enid?"

"Is at her old home at last," said the earl, in a constrained voice. "We carried her down and laid her in the old churchyard. She always wished to be buried there."

"I must go down and see the grave," murmured Margery.

"When you are able, you shall, my darling. Court Manor is waiting for its mistress. Ah, Margery, little did I think years ago that I should so gladly return to my home, all pain and bitterness rooted out of my heart forever, and in their place the sweet fragrance of love and happiness, brought me by a spirit of peace and purity—my wife!"

Margery moved her head restlessly on the silken pillow; his deep tenderness and devotion touched her wounded heart with healing gentleness, yet her burden was none the less, for he could never repay such great love, she could never give him what he gave her. Her pride had suffered such humiliations beneath the cruel cruelty of Vane Charteris' tongue that her heart might have thrilled now with satisfaction in the knowledge that she was—in the world's eyes—a great person—Countess of Court, a peeress of the realm. But there was no pride in her heart. Her husband's tender words only brought back with a sudden rush the memory of the great chasm between them. She drew her hand slowly from his, with the touch of his lips still clinging to it.

"You know," she whispered, meeting his gaze with her great starlike eyes—"you know—Enid told you that I am quite alone in the world—a waif, a stray?"

"Yes, I know it, my darling."

"And you care for me just the same?"

"I love you," he answered, smiling; "I loved you from the very first. Yes, Enid told me your sad story, and it only binds you still closer to me; henceforth I must be mother, father, brother, sister, husband, all in one. Do not hold a thought in your heart that such a circumstance could make any difference. Remember—"

"For unto every lord his own lady is All ladies and all beauties and all mysteries, The breathing multiple of roses—passionate."

"Nerves in Bad State Could Not Sleep"

Wavemouth, Ont., writes: "I was, and for nearly six months, in a bad state of nerves. I could not get a good night's rest. I could not sleep. I tried Dr. Chase's Nerve Food, and in a few days I began to feel better, and soon was able to sleep well at night. My appetite also returned, and I felt stronger and better, and after taking three boxes of Dr. Chase's Nerve Food I was quite well. I have also given the Nerve Food to my little girl, with good results."

the sea breezes brought a sense of relief and freshness to her spirit. She was fighting a hard battle with herself, striving with all her might to crush out her old love and turn to her husband, whose depths of goodness and generosity she was learning to know better each day. But as she grew stronger the struggle was more bitter; her thoughts would fly to Hurstley, to the dead Mary Morris whose memory she held so dear, and then to that other who was, despite all her efforts, so inextricably bound up with her existence.

The earl, totally ignorant of the secret in his wife's breast, revelled in his new-found happiness, rejoiced in the possession of his treasure. Day by day he was drawn closer to this girl whose sweetness had been sung by the lips of his dead sister. It was so great a change to him after those four years of ceaseless pain, distrust and darkness! Often in those days he had tried to escape from the remembrance of his life's mistake; but he could find no relief till that evening when he stood in the doorway listening to the sweet, girlish voice ringing through the room, and then suddenly misery and despair vanished, and hope revived—hope that afterwards became a sweet reality.

"Not by appointment do we meet De-light and Joy— They lead not our expectancy; But round some corner in the streets of life They on a sudden clasp us with a smile."

And now Margery was his wife—his very own; there was none to claim here, none to share the treasure of her love. Was not this blessing too great? His earnest eyes, dark with tenderness, were never tired of watching her lovely unconscious face as she sat buried in her memories of the past, the look of unutterable sadness that had touched him in their earlier acquaintance seeming to him now caused but by the recollection of her childhood's history, her mother's death.

At last the sunshine died, the sea's calm was gone, the tiny rippling movement was changed into gigantic rolling waves, crested with white foam, and dashing on to the beach in angry majesty, with a sound as of thunder. Margery loved the sea in its fury; she would sit and watch it for hours, her heart beating fast, and her nerves thrilling at the rage in its fierce waves and dashing spray. The anger, the wildness of the elements, relieved her overwrought mind, and the very tumult brought her peace.

She stood at the window one afternoon gazing at the expanse of dull, leaden-green water. There were no waves; it was as if a titanic movement from below agitated the surface and caused the heavy, sudden motion. As she stood thus, her husband approached her.

"Not tired of the sea yet, my darling?" he said, with a smile. "I shall be afraid to suggest a migration if this devotion lasts much longer."

"It is so wonderful," Margery answered, dreamily. "I can see such strange pictures, imagine such things, as I watch it. I have never seen it as it is to-day."

"There will be a storm to-night. I have just seen one of the fishermen, and he says they expect very rough weather."

"It looks an angry, discontented sea," Margery said, still dreamily, "as if its passion would be terrible when it did break forth."

"Look at the foot of the Templar's Rock! It is beginning already; the foam is as white as snow. There is, as you say, Margery, sullen discontent in its look; but there is also a wildness of despair. It reminds me, looking at that whirling rush round the rock, of Tennyson's words:

"Break, break, break At the foot of thy crags, O sea! But the tender grace of a day that is dead Will never come back to me!"

With a little shudder Margery turned from the window.

"To-day has broken the spell," she said, hurriedly, with forced lightness. "I think I am tired of the sea at last."
