How Tolstoi Caught the Lady. An amusing incident occurred during Tolstoi's recent visit to the Crimea. A rich American arrived in his yacht, accompanied by a party of friends, and asked permission to see the great Russian, who was ill, promising that they would be content with a glimpse, and would not trouble him with talk. Leave was granted. Tolstol sat upon his bal-cony, and the whole party of Americans slowly and silently walked before him. One lady, however, refused to be bound by the contract. She stood still for a ninute and shouted: "Leo Tolstoi, all your noble writings have had a profound influence upon my life, but the one which has taught me the most is Here she forgot the name o the work. The sick author leaned over rail of the balcony and whispered a a smile: "The Dead Souls?" "Yes. " she replied. "That book." said

Therapeutic Magnificent Production - Audience Not Large-Splendid Scenic Effects.

One of the most refined and finished productions it has been Londoners' good fortune to witness in many years was that of Mrs. Fiske in "Mary of Magdala," at the Grand Saturday night. Supported by a cast of exceptional ability, the brilliant American actress gave an impersonation in the more than beautiful drama, which enraptured by far the most critical audience of the season. The play, which is from the German, by Paul Heyse, and translated and adapted by William Winter, is in five acts, the action passing in and near Jerusalem, in the days of Pontius Pilate. The Magdalen is pictured as a victim of an unhappy marriage, who has been led to sin in a vain search for happiness. Now, wearied of her life, she has closed her doors to all admirers save one-Judas of Kerioth, a Hebrew patriot, filled with the anti-Roman spirit of the time. Judas becomes a follower of Nazarene in the belief that he will be a temporary king and free Juden of the church. Mr. Bondfield said the the Sunday school held in the after bondage. One of the number stays the mob by repeating the Master's words: "He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone." A new life has opened to her and she, too, becomes a follower of the Nazarene, renouncing even Judas, that she may give herself wholly to the Master's service. Judas' hopes been crushed because Nazarene preaches peace instead of the sword, and at last, broken in spirit, he yields in despair to the suggestion of Caiaphas, the high priest, and agrees to walk and to please God, so we would to the betrayal of Christ. Vivid flashes of lightning scintillate across the sky. lighting up the rocks and crags; the rain beats down in torrents, the wind whistles and roars through the ravine and ever and anon deafening peals of thunder shake the hills. As a reproduction of a storm in all its fury and intensity it is doubtful if it could be improved upon, and it is amidst this turmoil of nature that Judas moans out his self-denunciation for having sent to his death an innocent man. The stage furnishings also proved of much interest, being of the type in vogue nearly two thousand years ago.
The incidental music, which was composed and selected by Charles Puerner, was of a classical order, and
