No Substitute for Christianity.—Infidels should never talk of our giving up Christianity till they can propose something superior to it. Lord Chesterfield's answer, therefore, to an infidel lady was very just. When at Brussels he was invited by Voltaire to sup with him and Madame C. The conversation happening to turn upon the affairs of England, "I think, my lord," said Madame C, "that the parliament of England consists of five or six hundred of the best informed men in the kingdom." "True, madame, they are generally supposed to be so." "What, then, my lord, can be the reason they tolerate so great an absurdity as the Christian religion?" "I suppose, madame," replied his lordship, "it is because they have not been able to substitute anything better in its stead; when they can, I don't doubt but in their wisdom they will really adopt it."

Human Nature.—When some one was talking before that acute Scotchman, Doctor Cheyne, of the excellence of human nature, "Hoot, hoot, mon," said he, "human nature is a rogue and a scoundrel, or why would it perpetually stand in need of laws and religion."
