"In spite of any thing!"

He draws a long, sighing breath.
"Oh." he says, softly, "it would be worth something to possess your friendship. Now-do you really wish, for my advice?"

"Then here is your case: You have friend; you trust her fully; nothing can shake your fatth in her. Suddenly, she does at hing, shocking, incomprehensible, and, in doing it, ask you not to question, for these can hing, shocking, incomprehensible, and, in doing it, ask you not to question, for the can him the search of the properties and the search of the search of the properties and the search of the searc

The detective laughs.

"No, this is one of my business faces, and you, sir, are one of the few who him staggering to his feet, and a few moments later, a plain statement of the facts, hurled bluntly at him by one of the loungers, sobered him completely. In an instant he had laid his informant sprawling in the saloon sawdust. He declared it a calumny, as you did, and declared war upon the lot of them. Soon kinder hands rescued him from these tormentors, and men he could not doubt convinced him of the truth of the unhappy affair. And then, any who saw would have pitted him. The boy is wild and bad, but he has a heart, and he loves his sister. Poor fellow' he is not all bad."

"Poor Evan!"

"He telegraphed at once to his father, and then set out for Mapleton, looking like the ghost of himself, but carrying a fresh filled flask."

"Of course," mournfully.

"He would have started in pursuit, had they not convinced him of the folly of such an undertaking."

"And now, Miss Wardour, we have arriyea at the end of a certainty, and to enter the field of conjecture is useless. The time may come when some of us may be of actual service to this most unhappy friend of yours. I confess that I wait with some curjosity the movements of her parents in the matter."

"The detective laughs.

After dinner Aunt Honor occupies herself with the evening paper; and, after awhile, Constance and Doctor Heath pass out through the low, broad French window, and stand on the balcony. The light from within falls upon them and that portion of the balcony where they stand. There is a young moon, too; and just beyond is a master oak, that spreads its great branches out, and out, until they rustle, and sway above the lower half of the long balcony, and rap and datter against the stone walls.

"Have you thought," asks Constance, as she leans lightly against the iron railing, "that to-morrow is Sunday, and that Mr. Lamotte, unless he has already returned, can not reach home until Monday?"

"It has occurred to me,"
"And poor Sybil! Where will she be Miss Wardour! What disinterested-

"And he has made a blunder."
"Not necessarily."
"He may have seen an officer immediately, and the man may be now on the way, by the night train. He will be sure to be here before Monday, or he is no detective. They depend very little on the regular trains."
"Oh; I am enlightened! All the same, I shall never see my diamonds more."
"You don't seem much troubled."
"Yrled, all pride! I'm heart broken."
"You are a most nonchalant young lady."
"Yes—it's contagious."
Then they both laugh, and relapse into silence. Presently she says:—
"We are sure to have the wrong man. Why did you not tell me the pame of your great detective, so that I might have commissioned Mr. Lamotte to bring him? That man has been in my mind all day. You have made me enamored of him."
"Why?" laughing indulgently; "I barely mentioned him."
"No matter; you say he is a splendid officer?"
"And your search," asks Constance.
"What a curious thing it is that Mr. Lamotte should have secured you of all mot think it possible Mr. Lamotte—"
"Pardon me, all of you," breaks in the gentleman tramp. "Something must be set right; I will come to the point at once. Who is Mr. Lamotte? What is Mr. Lamotte? What is Mr. Lamotte? I have never seen him; never heard of him."
"What!" from Constance.
"Oh!" from Mrs. Aliston.
"But—" from Doctor Heath.
"Let me finish," he interpolates. "Let me tell you just how I happened to drop down among you to-night. Recently we have had a trace or clue, and have hoped to find the robbers, but so far have been baffled. We must necessarily have many ways of gathering up information, and I have some methods of my own. This is one of them. I have access to the offices of our daily papers. I have a friend or tool in each. When a special telegram, in the line of criminal intelligence, comes to one of these papers, I am in possession of its contents before it has reached

"Mr. Neil Bathurst. Why, my dear?"

"Mr. Neil Bathurst. Why, my dear?"

"Oh, nothing special, auntie;" then returning to the window, "Auntie never loses trace of a crime or a trial in high life. I have heard her talk of this man's splendid exploits, by the hour. She is a walking catalogue in all aristocratic sensations. So this is your great man? Well, if he is in the city, we must have him. Mr. Lamotte shall bring his man, or send him; there should be work for two. As for me, I intend to secure the service of Mr. Neil J. Bathurst."

"He may not be within reach; he is constantly moving, and always busy."

"No matter. I tell you I want to see this man."

"That being the case, I may as well present myself."

They start at the rustling of leaves, and from one of the great oak's extended branches, a form swings downward, and drops lightly upon the grass, just before

"Who are you?" demands Doctor
