CHAPTER XLIV.

"Say that I will be there in a few minutes," was the reply; and the man went away.

Sir Basil turned to Hettie. "Let me take you to the house," he said. "You must not remain here."

"I cannot go. You must leave me here. I cannot walk," she said; "I tremble! Do you not see how I tremble? You must leave me."

He looked terribly distressed. "My darling!" he began.

But she held up her hand.

"Hush, Basil!" she said. "Remember, you are Leah's lover."

"I will not leave you, Hettie," he said. "You will faint."

"No; do not fear; listen to me. It will be all for the best. You go now. No one will know that you have seen me, and they will tell you the story. We must meet after that as strangers. Go."

"Heaven knows that no man was ever more puzzled or more unhappy than I," he said.

Her eyes were dim with tears as she watched him—Leah's lover; and then, as he went slowly down the terrace, a mist seemed to rise before her; she swayed to and fro, staggered, and, helpless, fell suddenly to the ground.

CHAPTER XLV.

As he passed quickly through one of the side-halls of Brentwood, Sir Basil caught a glimpse of his face in a mirror, and started back, almost frightened, by his own reflection. Was that haggard face his? He stood still for a few minutes before he went to the library, to endeavor to collect himself, to drive the weird shadows from his face and eyes, to clear his brain. Then, when he was in some measure himself, he went at once to the room where the general awaited him.

Sir Arthur was alone, and so pre-occupied with his own thoughts that he did not notice the pallor and agitation of Leah's lover. He shook hands with him, and welcomed him home most heartily.

"I am glad to see you, Basil," he said. "I assure you that some of us have found the past few days very long ones. We have had a very unpleasant, anxious time of it since we parted. I am thankful it is over. There remains a duty perhaps even more disagreeable, and that is to tell you a story which I would fain have buried in oblivion."

"A story!" repeated Sir Basil. This, then, was what Hettie meant when she said "they" had something to tell him.

"You will always remember, Basil, that it is I who have kept this secret from you. It was by my desire, my wish that nothing was said. Leah would have had it otherwise, if I had let her have her own way. The fault, if there be any fault, lies with me. You can judge when I have told you. Let me add this—if anything which I tell you should be adverse to your tastes and opinions, you are as free as air, Leah would not bind you. You have only to say the word."

"Nothing can free me from Leah," he said; and, Sir Arthur, in his satisfaction at the words, did not notice the tone of the speaker's voice.

"Thank Heaven for that! Now listen to my story, Basil. I will begin from my earliest recollection of the one being I loved better than the whole world—my little sister."

He did not think it strange that Sir Basil turned his face to the window, so that no change passing over it could be seen.

At first Sir Basil seemed hardly to realize the words he heard—they passed over him as it were; then they began to strike on his brain. Some faint glimmer of the truth came to him when he heard the name of Martin Ray—enough to turn him faint and dizzy, to make his heart beat wildly.

He never forgot that hour. From the window he saw the sunshine on the distant hills and woods, on the bare branches of the trees, on the white stone terraces and the evergreens; a little robin redbreast flew up and down; the wind blew the brown branches of a dead guelder-rose against the window-panes. He never forgot one detail.

The general's voice went on in dull monotone; and presently Sir Basil's attention was caught and riveted by the names of Leah and Hettie, the two fair sisters. He listened intently as the general told him, with some dramatic skill, the story of the choice they made. He was back again with Martin Ray in fancy, listening to this same relation, but told in so different a fashion; and he remembered with a bitter pang that when Martin Ray recited the story he (Sir Basil) had condemned Leah—he had judged her cold and selfish; he had admired Hettie, the daughter who clung to her father, a thousand times more than her who had left him. And now the girl whom in his own mind he had considered selfish and heartless was she whom he was to make his wife. He blamed himself that he had not discovered the truth; it all seemed now so easy to understand. He could not even imagine how he had been so blind, save that it had never occurred to him to connect Martin Ray and his family with the general's household.

While these thoughts ran riot through his brain, the general went on with his story, and Sir Basil listened in silence to the end.

It was true then; he the most unfortunate of men, stood between these two loving sisters. He loved one with his whole heart, and he was bound in honor to marry the other, and both loved him. Was there ever such a misfortune such a fate? He was silent from sheer excess of despair. Who could have thought that the beautiful, queenly woman and the fair, winsome girl were sisters—one the very queen of beauty and fashion, the other earning her living and supporting her father by teaching? Fate must have been laughing at them when it led him to Southwood.

The general wondered at his silence, and, when he had finished his story, waited for his young companion to speak. Still, Sir Basil sat with his face to the window, silent and still.

"You will understand," said Sir Arthur, "that it was no question of social inequality. If my sister had married one greatly her inferior in rank, and he had been a loyal, honest man, I should have respected him; but a man like Martin Ray I could not tolerate. There is no use in speaking ill of the dead; but my sister would never have written to me without due reason to ask me to save her children. However it may be, whether I did right or wrong, it cannot be altered now. If you find any reason, Basil, in what I have told you for bringing your engagement to an end, you will be justified in doing so."

"The general was struck by the pain and the pallor of the face turned to him.

"I do not complain," said Sir Basil, "though I wish that I had known the truth from the first. I understand your motives and respect them. I, in your place, should probably have done the same thing; but I think better of Martin Ray than you do; and the fact that he was the father of the girl I loved would never have made the slightest difference to me. I hope you will not be annoyed when I say that Martin Ray's daughters would have been the same to me as daughters of your own."

"I am delighted to hear it," returned Sir Arthur. "Affairs have changed considerably of late years. Martin has been like a lion with his teeth drawn; but, when my poor sister ran away with him, he was a power in the land."

Sir Basil was thinking deeply. He decided that it would be much better for him not to mention that he had ever seen or known Martin Ray—much better for the whole sad story should be buried and done with forever. Yet, as he framed these thoughts, he was dazed and blind with his great misery. What manner of life lay before him—loving one sister, marrying the other, and the one he loved always near him?
