First Aid for Anglers

HOW TO FAIL AT FISHING.

Occasionally at the seaside you will find several old gentlemen arranged in a row on the pier in the intervals between the penny-in-the-slot machines, sitting down, gazing savagely at the sea. They sit so still that you might fancy they were waxworks provided by the local council to amuse visitors, but on a closer examination you will see that each old gentleman is dangling a string into the water.

These old gentlemen are fishing and the idea of fishing, although you might never guess it, is to catch fish. Some fish, like sardines, live in the open, but most of them spend their time swimming in the sea. They don't know enough to come in out of the rain, but they are not foolish enough to give themselves up, nor can they be caught with the aid of a bait of salt on their tails.

It is not wise, also, to dive in after them, or a range of them might club together and hold you under water until you get drowned. Even a sprat will fight savagely in defence of its own hearth and home.

The theory is that you offer a fish some breakfast, in the middle of which is concealed a hook. The fish eats the breakfast, and the hook—or that is the supposition, anyhow—then you save him from a watery grave by pulling him out of the sea. It is a fascinating game but it seldom comes off.

The fish usually eats all the breakfast, then pulls the string to let you know that he is still hungry, and its time you hang some more breakfast on the line for him. There's the story for you, but fish never have any money. They're like husbands.

You quite realize now, of course, that the breakfast is the most important part of the operation, and this usually consists of a worm.

Worms, however, are not the only bait you can use. It depends on the sort of fish you are after. If you want some of those fourpenny pieces, with plenty of vinegar and some chips, the only thing that will attract them is a sheet of nice ink newspaper. Bloaters suffer a great deal from overcrowding, and you can catch millions with one advertisement of a house to let.

Tiddlers like a jam-jar, preferably a strawberry one, as plum and apple is out of date. For a dogfish you need a catfish, obviously; and for a whale—if for any reason you should happen to want a whale—produce an old pair of corsets. These are full of whalebone, which is the stuff the whale likes to take to the bed of the ocean and worry, the same as if he were a fox terrier.

No doubt in these scientific days it won't be long before we use wireless to help in fishing. The line would make a good aerial, and after it had been playing a little while, you'd be able to watch hundreds of fishes sitting in a ring, listening to Uncle Ambrose, or dancing sorrowfully to the Blues. Some fish, again, are attracted by bits of looking-glass, which only goes to show you girls how dangerous is vanity. Others will follow a piece of brightly colored rag for miles, to end their careers by being served up filleted, fried, and sprinkled with lemon juice.

Wherefore, all you young men who get perturbation when you see a pair of ankles, or a knitted jumper, take warning. These things are like rags, likewise, and your end may be stickier even than the fishes'. You may even get married.

Up till now I have been taking it for granted that when you fish, you hope for fish, but you can catch all sorts of things with a rod and line, from the hook in your trousers to the hump. Some fishermen make a speciality of old boots. They could fish in a quart goldfish bowl, and gather enough old boots out of it to stock a Government Supplies Store. What bait you use for these I don't know, unless it is bootlaces. Others catch bricks, and I know one sportsman who caught a policeman. The policeman was swimming about under the pier at the time. There was some trouble about it, for my friend was in an angling competition at the time, and the prize was awarded for the heaviest catch. He wanted to include the copper, who weighed seventeen stones, only as it happened, the next man caught the pier itself, which weighed about two hundred tons, so he won easily. I may say that nobody caught any fish. Nobody ever does in an angling competition.

I will presume that you have selected the kind of fish you require, and suitable bait. Previously, of course, you have provided yourself with a rod to hang the line on. You need a rod, because it makes it so much easier for the spiders to sing their webs from it, and you ought always to be kind to dumb animals. On the end of the line you now proceed to fasten the hook.

You may have heard tales of little boys who have caught shares on bent pins, but bent pins are against the rules, because they've only got one point, whereas your hook should have two, one for the bait, and the other for your thumb.

All that now remains is for you to drop the ball overboard and wait until it's dark, so that you can come home without being seen. After all, you don't want all your friends to know what a fool you've been.

Now comes the really interesting part of fishing. On your way back you will meet all the men who were with you on the pier. You know they've caught nothing, but in most cases they'll be carrying baskets full of all sorts of fish from tins of blonster paste to dried kipper. That's because at the end of every pier there is a fishmonger's.

No matter you can now tell them exactly how that octopus got away from you, and how you threw it back because it was so heavy that you were afraid that it would sink the pier.

Master of the King's Horses

The Master of the Horse has a salary of £2,500 a year in return for his services in a not arduous post, but all the same this Court appointment is one in which the holder can, if he likes, make his influence felt.

When the Duke of Cornwall was King Edward's Master of the Horse, it was generally conceded that the Royal equippage had never been so well turned-out. Every detail was perfect, carriages, harness, and horses, the latter being for the most part grand Cleveland bays of a type not often seen to-day.

The real work in the Master of the Horse's department is on the Crown Equerry. Only when the King himself is in residence at Buckingham Palace has the Master of the Horse to be in London at all, to accompany His Majesty at short notice.

Honest I'll Say So

Edmonton, May 30.—Were you in Dawson City, in the Yukon, in 1903 with the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, asked a burly chap who walked into the office of Inspector J. S. Piper at headquarters of "A" division, the office of the Alberta provincial police, recently.

"Well," responded the inspector, "I was, I borrowed fifty cents from you in 1903," said the stranger, "and here is your money."

With that the man left the office, refusing to disclose his name.

A BLEAK BELIEF

I'd hate to think all men are crooks, that he one's on the square, that good men only live in books, and are but fabric there. I've always held the human race to be a great success, and if I found it in disgrace 'twould jar me. I confess, the gloomy grotesque hand us bunk and would the race defame, but I have never seen it sunk in dismal swamps of shame, I do not think my native grad is but a total loss because some skates whose hearts are bad put sinful stunts across. I do not think the country speeds to ruin and decay, because some longsome grater's deeds are in the news-to-day. I do not think our eagle hold will motivate its screens because some swindler gathers gold by working victim schemes. Each day I read some thrilling tales of sinners and their sin, of scoundrels locked in money falls for selling deadly gin. But over this I do not brood or say the laws are junk; because one anarchist is stowed, why call the nation drunk? The good old human race, my friends, is always stacking high, the pull of virtue never ends, though sin and sinners die. Though one may shake the neighborhood with actions base, obscene, ten thousand hearts are brave and good, ten thousand lives are clean.
