Paris, Dec. 4 .- Despite the popular tion of young people with all types in belief that women are more reluctant cabarets and night clubs. She says: red light, shouting unequivocally than men to tip waiters and the like, the color of French income taxes has to be true. We do not like unattracment that scores of French waiters | tive people, but at least in cabarets, are enriched by tips. Nor is it unsuspected that many of the concierges in French hotels own valuable property and sous contributed by guests. The last place, however, that one ing specimens. would look for the world's champion tippee would be in a ladies' hair dressing parlor, but that is where the champion was found. The builder of coiffures reported to the collector that he had received 10,000 francs in tips in twelve months. French cafe owners seldom pay their waiters. Some cafes, with especially good business, even sell jobs in the dining room to the highest bidders among prospective waiters. On the tax list is a walter who thus purchased his job. He paid tax on an income of 50,000 francs. This waiter works in a small brasserie in one of the suburban centres. He has had his job for five years and now is the owner of a house valued at 100,000 francs. When asked why he does not buy the brasserie, he replied: "I prefer my tips."

Americans frequently quarrel with the continental tipping system. They particularly abhor the custom of tipping everyone in sight upon leaving a hotel, even though some of the tippees have contributed nothing tangible to the guest's comfort. But abhor it as they will, few if any have the courage to ignore the palms. Tipping has become a compulsory rather than a voluntary business. Try to look a Paris taxi driver in the eye and tell him that because he took too long a route you are not go ing to tip him. He will call a policenan-or perhaps you will.
