with reverence, murmuring to herself psalms of thanksgiving. She had wakened so often to the blank of hopeless grief, that she felt now a selemu gravity in this new beginning of life; it seemed to her like the visible interposition of the Divine Hand—a miracle of joy.

The blinds had been drawn up, and the morning sun looked brightly into the room. These little imaginative attentions could be rendered only by Holen, but Helen had left the room before Lilias awoke from the long, happy sleep of her new peace.

Helen had left the room before Lilias awoke from the long, happy sleep of her new peace.

In a room below Helen stood beside the old housekeeper. A great pile of white linen lay on the table before them, and Mrs. Mense was exhausting herself in its praise.

"Na, if yo had Mossgray's ain muckle spyglass that sits up the stair at the study window, ye could scare count the threads, said the old woman, trumphanly; "it's that fine, and yet see, Miss Buchanan, Mr. Haibert's no' what ye could ca' weel supplied, coming out from amang frem! folk, ye ken. I've been wanting to see about getting them made this lang time, only I didna like to fash the young lady; but Mossgray says I may speak to her noo. Do ye think I may speak to Miss Lilias noo and no fash her, Misa Buchanan?"

"What is it, Mrs. Mense?" said Lilias, coming forward with a peaceful light upon her face which could not be misapprehended. The old woman glanced at her changed dress and brightened.

"Ye see, Miss Lillie, it's just the new linen. I dinna shink ye ever lookit at it before, is't no' beautiful? And I was just thinking we should hae it made. Ye see, Mr. Halbert be hasne ower mony, and to be ploutering and washing ance in a fortnigh like common folk isna do for the like o' us; and ye micht get some yourself. Miss Lillie; some o' the new-fashioned kind wi' the frills, for it's a muckle web, and it would be a guid turn to somebody, the making o' them."

ousness, dyspepsia and indigestion. These are the leading ailments of our time with office men.

Sedontary habits and occupations contribute largely to serious diseases. Many an office man has shortened his life by a too close application to duties, and a neglect of outdoor exercise. It matters not how strong the constitution, or how rugged the man's frame may be, such sedentary occupations will soon pull him down from his position of strength.

For such broken-down men, Paine's Celery Compound is earnestly recommended. This important remedy is a strengthener and life-giver of extraordinary value. It is safe, powerful and effective in every case, and will quickly build up the shattered constitution.

If you are one of the weak and used up office men, dear reader, we urge you to give Paine's Celery Compound a fair and honest trial. One week after using the Compound you will begin to feel that you must continue the good work.
