Down in the "run" all was white save Class A, Klondike, Lithopolis, Black- where the gray stems of alder, or the thicker trunk of swamp maple rose above the snow, and standing by the brookside the ripple of the water as Class C, Brown Billy, Deutrot, Strat- it poured over stones and tinkled against the shell ice was heard be-Class D, Dan, S. G., Bett, Doc, Gold neath the white covering. The weeds stand high in the old corn lot beyond, but a multitude of migrants have long ago stripped them of seeds, and no a bird was visible until the border of the woods was reached. Then, from a bunch of ragweed a white-throated sparrow sprang into the air, paused for moment on an alder twig, and plunged into the woods. Half a mile of winding walk through forest showed nothing alive. The swamps were frozen, yet here had melted a hollow in the icy covering, so that it broke easily with a resounding crash. At the end of the interrupt the view. The wind had risen now, snow-flakes were falling thicker than ever, and whirling about in the fashion of a true western blizzard. Along the road song sparrows among the tangled cat briers and were whirled away to some other nook where comfort might be found. In another strip of woods the winter chopper had been at work, and great chestnuts and white-barked beeches lay prostrate on the ground, partly cut up now into neatly-piled cordwood. On the hillside at the border of the wood the warm spring, open even in this sharp cold, looked dark and deep, and somewhere down below a multitude of frogs were sleeping in its oozy bottom. From the undulating meadow which crowns the hill, dotted with conical cedars, with great erratic
