New York, Nov. 18.-Very likely Mattee, second cook of the Italian liner. Citta di Torino, was to blame for scaring the big Texas longhorn out of its wits and sending it rampaging through Eighth avenue and Broadway yesterday morning, ramming street cars, toppling over children, smashing show cases and reducing three kinds of policemen to inarticulate profanity. Matteo had been butchering somewhere in the bowels of the Naples and Genoa steamship, which was lying at the foot of West Thirty-fourth street, ready to set at noon. He appeared at the rail, whirling his long knife, to watch a sweating, struggling crew coax a handsome roan steer aboard. one of several doomed for slaughter while the Citti di Torina was crossing the Atlantic. Matteo wasn't a pretty sight. The marks of his trade were red on his white apron and sprinkled over his fat, amiable face. He threw advice to the cursing crew, while he regarded the nervous steer with a professional eye, subdividing it into soup meat, roasts and steaks.

Up the gang plank the steer went with bellowing protests. All might have been well if he hadn't caught sight and smell of Matteo fresh from p killing. Perhaps it was the gleam of the knife, or the odor of fresh blood, or just the climax of what he felt was his wrongs, but when he got to the top of the gangway, he went slam, bang crazy. A dozen men tried to hold him, gripping legs, feet and horns, but he shook them as a terrier shakes a rat, gave a bellow of defiance that rolled
