Putting up Poultry Fencing.

WIRE netting is so commonly used now for the yarding of fowls that some plan for properly putting up the fence is important. Ordinarily this fencing is slack and very untidy. It needs to be thoroughly stretched. To do this, the plan shown in the sketch may be used to advantage. A strip of board has four or more hooks arranged on one side to hold the roll firmly and to stretch each section as it is unrolled. A pulley attached to the following post draws the netting tightly past the preceding post, when it is secured firmly with staples and the work advanced to the next post. A fence thus put up will look neat and will be more serviceable in retaining fowls, as a sagging top wire invites attempts at flight.
