Residents return to Lady Dunn Hall

by Gordon Loane

Ninety residents of UNB's Lady Dunn Hall left temporarily homeless as a result of a fire November 15th should be back in their rooms by the end of this week.

However, it may take another week before two residents of the room where the fire originated may return to their surroundings.

Dean of Residence Mary Lou Stirling says sixty residents moved into their rooms permanently last Sunday on the third floor parking and T-wings. Thirty other women residents of the third floor river wing should be in their rooms tomorrow. Director of Physical Plant, Jim Walsh, says it could take up to another week to restore the room where the fire started. Painting and dry walling is in progress and work should be completed this week Walsh says.

Meantime, Lady Dunn Hall Don Lynn Fraser says everyone is staying somewhere in the residence until repairs are completed. Fraser says lounges and other rooms are being used temporarily, but the thirty residents have been allowed to move their personal belongings into their rooms even if they are not able to stay there just yet.

Fraser says five women who lost everything in the blaze have received gifts of cash and other donations. "The UNB Bookstore has replaced all of the text books lost by three students free of charge," she says. Bookstore Manager Doug McConnell says the university intends to spend about one thousand dollars replacing the texts.

Stirling says all third floor residents have received academic counselling and Christmas exams and term papers were deferred in many cases. Stirling says the students were given options depending on their academic work loads and personal circumstances.

Meantime, university officials are starting to add up the cost associated with the fire. Trevor Gonnason of the Comptroller's office has been assigned that task. He says the university will spend fifty thousand dollars on accommodation, transportation and other smaller costs associated with housing the ninety residents temporarily in various hotels around the city.

This cost will be absorbed by the university at no cost to the residents, but the university will not be able to recover the expenses through insurance, Gonnason says. What will be covered by insurance will be the

AIESEC UNB hosts national conference

by Jonathan Stone

While most students spent their holidays away from university, it was business as usual for the local chapter of AIESEC.

From December 30 to January 6, the UNB local played host to 350 students from across Canada.

AIESEC, The International Association of Students in Economics, Computer Sciences and Business Administration, is the largest student organization in the world.

One of AIESEC's goals is to provide students with an opportunity to gain international business experience.

"I think the basis of AIESEC is the exchange program," said Andrew Keenan, UNB's organizing committee chairperson.

"We try to get businesses here in the Fredericton area to hire students from other countries, and in return we can send one of our students away. So it's a reciprocal program," he added.

Other than the Canadian contingent, students from Ecuador, Germany and Africa were invited to take part.

The conference is also intended to educate incoming executives how to manage their locals.

This involves training the presidents how to maintain a team and how to be leaders; how to sustain a local and how to recruit members.

Another aim of the conference is to learn from the other locals.

"The objective is to learn from their mistakes and learn from their successes to make each other local better," said Keenan.

"We've learned different fundraising techniques, how to get people involved in their local, and how to keep people motivated," said Keenan.

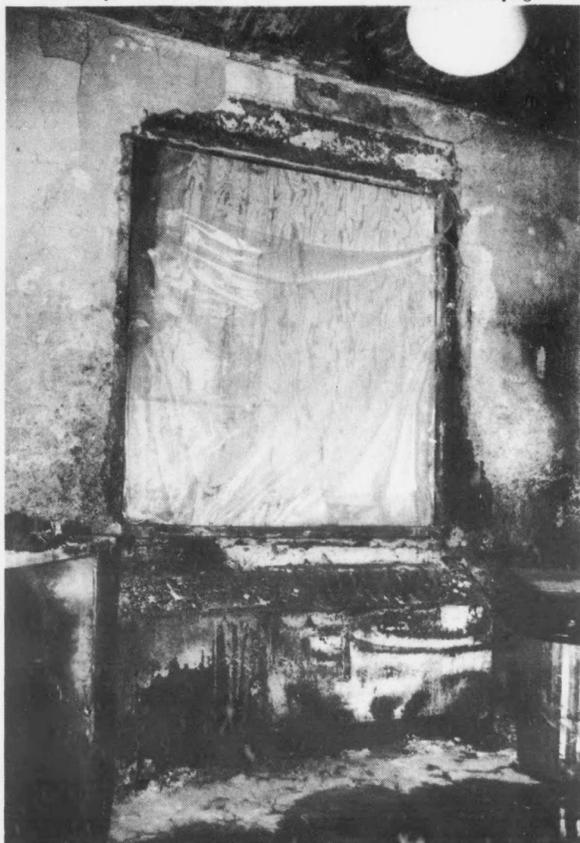

As well, sessions are held passing legislation concerning AIESEC policies that govern the locals for future years.

Both UNB and McMaster applied for hosting honours at the National Conference two years ago, but due to some strong self-promotion, UNB was selected.

To subsidize the event, AIESEC-UNB solicited funding from Maritime businesses.

Keenan explained that AIESEC-UNB developed a proposal indicating the purpose of the conference and sent letters to all companies in the Maritimes. Over the year they started getting a few responses and personal interviews with parties interested in making contributions.

As far as the success of the conference, Keenan noted, "We're just starting to get feedback today. People are generally really impressed."
