J. E. COLLINS..... EDI A CHAMBER OF DEAT.

The London corresponden the New York "Times" con butes the following sombre mance:

The owner of a country m sion here, a jovial old coun gentleman, with a large fam began to find his house so what too small for the requi ments of the countless gu with whom he delighted to it. He sent for an eminent ar tect, and consulted him as to possibility of adding a roon two without injury to the pearance of the building. architect went to work at inspected the house within without, made sundry meas ments, and returned to his with the complacent air of a who has found out some worth knowing.

"I'm fortunate enough,"

he, with a smile, "to have c

just in time to save you from very useless labor. Do you ki that while you are talking adding new rooms to your ho you have a room in it at moment which you have ne used yet?" "What on earth you mean?" asked the bew ered squire. "I mean," ansy ed the professional, with q scientific superiority, "that measurements I have just 1 taking leave several squ yards of the house's area un counted for; in other wo there is somewhere within walls a secret chamber of wl you know nothing." The sq laughed the idea to scorn, his wife, captivated by the mantic suggestion of a poss "Bluebeard's chamber" in own house, at once ranged l self on the side of the archi and insisted that the myster room should be searched for found. "If it exists." put in husband. "It not only exis retorted the architect, somew nettled by the implied doul his judgment, "but I am posi that I can point out the very where it is to be found. a hole in the wall that closes east end of the great corrido the third floor, and if you do find the secret chamber ly behind it. I will gladly pay the expenses of the search." proprietor, beginning to fee terested, in the of himself once agreed to the proposal, the workmen were prom called in. A few sturdy bl sufficed to bring down the already crumbling. Behin to the great exultation of architect and the amazemer the still incredulous squire. peared a moldering oaken o which was speedily driven revealing a dark recess, which exhaled a strange, ening odor. The architect, ing a lighted candle from or the bystanders-for by this t the whole household had ass bled to watch the progre the excavation-squeezed self through the aparture
