One reason for this may be the great flow of immigration from countries where the use of liquor is more prevalent. It can hardly be said that it is due to the number of places where liquor is sold, for the number of these has been, and is being, rapidly diminished, especially in proportion to the population. Thirteen or fourteen years ago, there were 69 saloons in this city. Now, with a population half as large again, there are only 41 places where liquor is sold, 6 of them being stoes. Some, who take a

Could not much of this energy be more profitably spent in actively combatting the evils of intemperance which worked actively to gain converts to the cause of temperance. The work did a great good. A sober people was built up, and our Province became the most temperate of any of the civilized countries. This work brought us to the high status of temperance which we hold today. I ask, has there been a relaxation from this work? Is it not possible that in the desire to get legislation, the most estimable work of winning converts to the cause of temperance has not been pressed as it was?
