After-Supper Story

A Short Story Complete in This Issue.

THE WINDOWS OF THE SOUL.

Martha Shaw had been advised by Dr. Webster to have her eyes fitted with glasses.

"You'll never get rid of your headaches until you do," he said brusquely. He gave her a long, searching look. "Most women of your age have been wearing spectacles for ten years."

Martha flushed as she always did when any allusion was made to her age. She felt as if Dr. Webster had purposely wounded her. She was sorry that she had come to him. Indignantly she bade him good morning and left his office.

Speculatives! The idea! She would never wear them. She would endure any amount of headache before she would submit to such disfigurement. What was a headache compared with ruining one's looks?

It was true that she could not read much nowadays and things looked oddly indistinct. The world seemed to be one great blur. Even her own face—

She went home and looked at herself in the glass. Yes! Her reflection was not clear, but she had thought the glass was growing old, not her eyes. And the picture was so charming that she had always felt a curious sense of enjoyment when she looked at it.

"I haven't changed a particle," she told herself. "Nobody would suspect I am 46. But if I put on spectacles I shall look every day in my life. No, can't and won't. I'll bear the headache."

But the headache persisted. It became, under, not only a nuisance, but a torment. Martha endured it for a week longer and then she gave in. "I shall have to get those glasses," she murmured.

She dressed for the ordeal as if she were going to an afternoon club meeting. All her life she had worn a certain shade of blue, because it brought out the tints of her flesh, the lights of her hair. As she looked in the glass she thought:

"I shall look a fright with specs across my nose."

As she left her lovely old-fashioned house where she lived alone, now that her bachelor brother had been sent to fill a government post in the Philippines, she saw that Mrs. Powers, who lived across the way, stood at her door talking to a man who was just leaving. That is, Martha was reasonably certain it was Mrs. Powers, but she had taken no chances since that recent blunder of hers—she had mistaken old Mr. Popple for Ezra Combs and had asked him how his wife liked the heat down there."

naturally a disconcerting question for Mr. Popple's wife had died while Ezra had gone with some friends to Florida. Besides, Mrs. Powers had made a great handle of the affair, and Martha did not feel very kindly toward her at present.

Two days later the expressman left a load of boxes at her door. She opened them and took out a hat, a tailored suit, and severely rich blouse, gloves, shoes—all the equipment of a middle-aged woman who does not need to spare expense in her attire.

That afternoon the woman's dub gave its spring reception at Miss Wright's, and Martha went, all dressed in her new clothes. Her black tailored suit—Miss Pardue had done beautifully with the aid of former measurements—fitted her admirably, her hat with its white wing, her gloves, her shoes, were fitting accompaniments.

Martha had scrutinized her appear-

So she hurried on without so much as a nod across the way.

Mr. Pratt, the oculist, fitted her to glasses with expert swiftness.

"Wear them until your headaches disappear and then you may lay them aside," he said pleasantly.

It was odd what those glasses did for Martha! She felt as if she had come out from a dark room into a brilliantly-lighted one. The street signs, the cracks in the sidewalk loomed large. As she approached her house she saw that it needed painting and that one of the chimneys leaned.

She entered and closed the door behind her. At that instant she saw her self in the full-length mirror of the massive old-fashioned hall rack.

Something within Martha seemed to pause. She put up her hands, her mouth flew wide open. The mirror was truthfully clear, and for the first time in years she saw an honest reflection of herself.

"Oh!" she cried. "Is that I? Oh, it can't be I!"

She drew close to the glass and studied herself. She was a nice-looking woman but she was not young. And she should never have worn that shade of blue!

"Why, I—I'm a fright," she gasped. "I'm ashamed of myself. Oh, suppose John had come back and found me like this! I should be never did come back! It was the first time she had ever been glad that the man who had been her brother's best friend and who had seemed to take more than ordinary interest in her, should never have come back to her as she had hoped that he might. At least she had been spared, for he had a delicate disease of the arteries that could not fail to have been outraged.

It was several hours before Martha recovered from the revelation of the hall mirror and of all the other mirrors in the house, for she appealed to them one after the other. Her little dressing-table mirror, hitherto so kind, was the most unrelenting in its presentation of facts.

"That night she did not sleep well and she had no appetite for her breakfast. As soon as she had drunk her coffee she sat down and wrote an order to the big department store, where for years she had been buying her blue gowns, wraps, etc. Martha would get that order and would interpret it fairly. Martha would get that order and would interpret it fairly.

HUSSARS INSPECTED AND COMPLIMENTED

City Unit Parades at Armories Before Gen. King and Staff Officers.

Brig-Gen. W. B. King, D.S.O., C.M.G., V.D., officer in command of military district No. 1, accompanied by Lieut.-Col. F. Gilman, general staff officer, inspected the units of the First Hussars of this city at the armories at night.

Three companies of the Hussars and the band were inspected by the officer commanding. The companies were put through individual squad drill by their respective officers, marching the length of the armories and going through squad manoeuvres. Later the whole unit, made up of the three companies, were put through a series of drills on the floor.

The band also was inspected. They marched the length of the building and played military numbers. At the end of their inspection the general congratulated the bandmaster on the showing of the band, both in ability and in equipment. Lieut.-Col. F. A. Taylor, D.S.O., officer in command of the First Hussars, was also complimented by General King on the showing of the unit.

It augurs well for the popularity of military affairs that the gallery at the inspection last night was filled with men, women and children who applauded the smart manoeuvres of the soldiers, and particularly the musical numbers rendered by the band.

BIRTHDAY OBSERVED BY U.C.T.A. AUXILIARY

Rooms in Alma Block Tastefully Decorated For Anniversary.

The first anniversary of the ladies' auxiliary of the United Travelers' association of America was held on Saturday, and the occasion was fittingly celebrated by a successful "birthday banquet" at their rooms in the Alma Block.

The rooms were tastefully decorated in blue and white, and more than 160 guests sat down to the effectively arranged tables. In the center of the room was placed a huge birthday cake, with one upright candle, which was presented to the ladies by the members of the London Council. No. 630, U. C. T. Senior Counselor Mrs. Noble acted as chairman and toastmistress for the evening's program.

A toast to the ladies' auxiliary was proposed by J. C. Doidge and responded to by Mrs. R. D. McGee. The toast to London Council, No. 630, was proposed by Past Counselor Mrs. R. A. Parrish and was responded to by Past Grand Counselor Fred St. Lawrence and Senior Counselor P. S. Oakden. Past Senior Counselor Geo. W. Price gave an interesting address on "The Day of Hope."

A splendid musical program was enjoyed during the evening, including a dance by the Misses Lucille and Metta Morrison, which received repeated encores. Solo dances were given by Peggy Smoothy, Lucille Morrison and Geraldine Smoothy. Vocal solos were rendered by Marjorie Francis, Alberta Webb and Master Woodrow Ward, while Dorothy Paul, Mrs. Armstrong and Mrs. Chas. Wilson delighted with instrumental numbers.

George W. Hall moved a vote of thanks to the ladies' auxiliary and the entertainers for the happy evening, which was enjoyed. The vote was seconded by Oliver H. Gidley. At midnight the singing of the National Anthem brought the successful evening to a close.

JUNIOR FARMERS URGED TO FORM ORGANIZATIONS

Special to The Advertiser.
Woodstock, Dec. 7.—A strong plea for the formation of junior farmers' organizations in every community of Oxford county was made here tonight by R. S. Duncan, supervisor of agricultural representatives for Ontario, who addressed a large gathering of young farmers of Oxford at a banquet held by the Woodstock Rotary club. Over 60 were present.

"Farmers are suffering more or less from a lack of co-operation," said Mr. Duncan, who predicted a promising future for the junior farmers' movement. One of the features of the evening was an address by W. Grenzbach of Hekoma, champion plowman of Ontario.

WILL TELL OF CHINA.

Special to The Advertiser.
Stratford, Dec. 7.—Dr. John Ledwith, missionary from Honan, China, is conducting a week of special services in St. Andrew's Presbyterian church. He deals particularly with his thirty-eight years of labor in the Chinese and Korean fields.

SPECIAL MUSIC BEING FURNISHED FOR SERVICES.

Special music is being furnished for all services by the choir, assisted by Mrs. May W. Munroe as soloist.

FETE EXETER PUPILS.

Special to The Advertiser.
Exeter, Dec. 7.—The lady teachers of the high school entertained the students from Exeter and district attending schools in London, to a dinner in Studdam & Ingram's, London, on Saturday.
