way the intelligent and skilful type-setters decipher'ed his miserably written manuscript. In connection with this subject I'm cannot help thinking of the great difference, the wide distance, between the brains and business abilities of different individuals. While some are a little lower than the angels, others are only a little higher than the apes. That hopes he does not belong to the latter class, though at times he has had serious doubts and misgivings on this subject. Ver the leaves the counten-ance, and encouragement he has received from the best, the most prominent and distinguished persons in the places he has visited, goes far to dispel this illusion, even as the grand luminary of day dispels the foggy damps and misty vapours of an early summer morning, as he rises higher and higher in the blue heavens. A word about the Mail office building. It is the highest, the grandest, the most complete and best arranged structure of its kind in the Dominion. It is a monument of human ingenuity, and of the inventive genius of man.
