patriot of 1794! Patriots everywhere have flocked to the standard of the Allies, France at last one of them, and a United Parliament, more gracious than Grattan, has left Irishmen conscript-free amongst the peoples—free to strike for freedom.

By such episodes and by such contrasts we measure the progress made by England and by Ireland on the difficult journey now proceeding to a common goal. Greater Britain—for many a year the phrase has been familiar, but now at last the fact. England finds she has been no loser by "the greatness of her goings-forth"—by the sons she has sent to make new and free peoples, exacting no levies on them for men or for money, and they, in turn, keeping open house to all comers. Side by side with Greater Britain stands that Greater Ireland the war also has revealed. Side by side they stand or fall together, stand in thanksgiving as victors and fall together on the field where victory is won.
