sain of six; Quebec 65, and Yukon 1. In short, there will be a gain of thirteen members. Ontario and the Maritime Provinces lose mine, and the provinces west of Lake Superior gain 22. This is upon the assumption that Prince Edward Island wuh lose a member. But if her representation is not reduced, and remains at four, the next house will contain 250.

Four Provinces Must Join.

The prime minister then discussed the case of the Maritime Provinces, and the particular case of Prince Edward Island. He, said the B.N.A. Act had been construed by the privy council, and that, as a matter of law, the Maritime Provinces must lose five members. The B.N.A. Act of 1867 was a compact between Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and no change in the representation of these provinces could be made, except by their unanimous consent. Even then an amendment to the B.N.A. Act would be required. The recent interprovincial conference had declined to deal with the matter, saying that the Dominion Parliament could not amend the B.N.A. Act, nor would it ask the British Parliament to do so, except upon the request of the four provinces which formed the original confederation.

P.E.I.'s Plaint Effective.

In the case of Prince Edward Island, Mr. Borden submitted that parliament act, and he strongly intimated that the government desired to have Prince Edward Island retain her present representation. The prime minister said that as soon as the redistribution bill had received its second reading it would be sent to a committee consisting of four Conservatives and three Liberals.

Favor Rural Ridings.

It might be well, he said, upon the second reading of the bill for the house to discuss and determine the basic principles which should guide the committee in its deliberations. It was pretty well agreed that municipal boundaries should not be disturbed and that equality of representation and community of interest were no less important. He thought, however, that the unit of representation should be larger for city constituencies than for rural constituencies. The reasons were obvious. There was greater solidarity among city people, more uniformity of interest and ability to work quickly and harmoniously together for a common end. Many members representing county ridings lived in the cities and were well acquainted with the views of city people, and were more or less in sympathy with them. Again, people tilling the soil upon which they were born and upon which their forefathers had lived for generations, had a more stable interest in the community than the city dwellers, who included a large floating population.
