cultural life of the city of the future. We are awakening to the need not only of better farming and better marketing but of better living in the country east and west.

We are shouldering new responsibilities of nationhood. Foreign policy is becoming of vital interest. For years we have been threshing out the question of our relations to the rest of the Empire, but we are still far from a solution that meets the changing needs and changing temper. Is our federal system working satisfactorily? Does political corruption prevail in Canada in any abnormal degree, and so far as it does exist, is it to be accepted as a permanent fact? What railroad or canal expansion is required for wheat-marketing or nation-binding ends? Is further state aid required, state regulation adequate, state ownership a possibility? What policies should be adopted for conserving and developing the national domain? What tariff policy, what taxation system, what banking regulations, do actual conditions require? What constructive policy is called for in regard to the merger movement, to company flotation and financing? Is the workingman securing his fair share of the nation's prosperity? Do changing industrial conditions or social theories warrant introducing old age pensions, compulsory insurance against sickness or unemployment, widows' pensions, a minimum wage? Is our educational system providing adequate training alike for living and for making a living? These are only some of the issues that will occur to every Canadian who has been watching his country's transformation.

Aids in Solution.

Of course these and other problems are being faced. Parliaments discuss; administrators experiment. The
