He thought it most ridicultive corresponding with the British army council, composed, first, of the minister of militia, who would be chairman of the council, with four military men, viz., the chief of the general staff, who will be the principal officer; the adjutant-general, the quartermaster-general and the master-general of ordnance and two additional civilians, probably the deputy minister and chief accountant of the department. In this way the minister would be in touch with the whole clause had any value whatever at was to define the example of the militia system. The position of the same to define the exceutive power of the general officer commanding would be dispensed with under the bill, the council being largely in substitution of that office.

With the money question out of the way, a good deal of importance is likely to be attached to Caesarism, militarism or imperialism as it is variously called, and on this point Bryan would be strong. The platform declaration for tariff reform leaves it uncertain whether that will be an important issue; the cleavage may be made sharper by the campaign into which the people are now plunged.

Wordy Warfare. Said the prime minister: "This seems to me to be a wordy warfare. I rather agree with the minister of justice that there is no necessity for the clause. I think we might allow it to stand in the meantime."

To the clause respecting relative rank, the minister added a sub-clause to the effect that officers of the imperial army when on temporary service in Canada shall be granted commissions in the Canadian militial equivalent to their rank in the imperial army. The 67th clause relating to drill camps was passed without amendment, and at the minister's suggestion the house rose at 10.30. Avoided Redundancy.

Sir Frederick's reply was that another bill dealing with the naval militia would be introduced this session. The minister of justice then repeated his amendment, which, he said, avoided redundancy. He thought a clause stating that the command-in-chief was vested in the King would be satisfactory. His only objection to the proposed wording, however, was that it was over-redundant. He accordingly moved in amendment that the clause read: "That the command-in-chief of the militia should continue to be vested in the King, and shall be exercised and administered by His Majesty or by the governor-general as his representative."

This amendment, which the minister declared did not curtail the function of the government, as the governor would act thru his constitutional ndvisers, was carried, Mr. Bourassa alone voting against it.
