Some Boxers Require a Long Time to Develop a K. O. Blow

By TOM ANDREWS

It takes some boxers a long time to develop a real knockout punch and some never get one, while to others it comes as natural as it is for a duck to swim. Kid Lavigne was not a big man, but he had the knack of delivering a knockout punch once he could land on the jaw. Joe Gans was not known as a heavy hitter, still he knew how to hit and he could always put his man away any time he connected with the right spot. Kid McCoy was a slender youth with a hand like a girl's, and still he had the knack of hitting and putting big heavy weights away for the ten count. Jim Corbett was a much bigger man than McCoy, but Jim never tried much for the K. O., as he preferred the McParland style of outpointing his man. The late Jack Dempsey was a small man for a middle weight champion and still he had a terrific punch, because he knew how to deliver the blow. It was the same with John L. Sullivan. The big fellow scored many knockouts in short bouts and most of them came of know how to hit at the right time. Charlie Mitchell was another small man who put many heavy weights to sleep and all because he knew how to hit.

Dave Smith, an Australian middle weight, a few years ago, was considered a very good man, but lacking a knockout punch; in fact in most of his matches he seemed content to win on points. When he fought Jimmy Clabby over the matinee he knocked out his opponent, a Frenchman, in real John L. Sullivan style. Then he began to improve still more, and in his next fight with a local middle weight, knocked him cold in half the distance. This will be encouraging to Dave and we may hear more of his championship aspirations soon. Johnny Kilbane, feather weight champion, is another lad who was never considered a hard hitter; in fact, he was always entitled to outpoint his man. However after the critics began calling Johnny a "paper" champion, he got his dander up and soon got next to the real K. O. punch. He cut loose in his bout with Oliver Kirk at St. Louis, and put him away for the ten count, also Monte Attell and George Kirkwood, which goes to prove that boxers can learn to deliver the sleep producer if they care to take the time and study it out.

Thursday of next week, Halifax, Sussex, Fredericton, Y. M. C. A., and the local teams of Black's alleys are entered, while it is expected that word will be received from St. Croix today.

The first practice of the season of the St. John Rifle Club was held yesterday afternoon at the range, creating a record for an early start in the history of the rifle club of the city.

Some fine scores were made by the marksmen, and the first day's shooting is considered very creditable. The scores of the first four marksmen follow:

Armed, the champion professional sculler of the world, is planning to return to England direct and challenge the winner of the Barry-Pearce race. Armed is reported to have secured backing of $5000. It is pointed out that Armed cannot force Barry to race him before his first race Pearce, and yet the prospective presence of the big Australian in England causes much speculation, in the opinion of the Englishmen.
