UNREST IN MODERN ENGLAND.

A Study of Significant Changes in the Old Land—A Pessimistic Presentation of Affairs Given by a Writer in a London Review.

A very striking article on the Condition of Things in England appears in the August issue of the Portsmouth Review from the pen of Mr. Sydney Whitman.

The writer quotes a number of pessimistic utterances of distinguished men on the future of the country, and then adds:—"After making every allowance for the tendency of old age towards pessimism, this consensus of apprehension as to the future among thinkers is surely the most gloomy feature in a country the dazzling political position of which challenges comparison with that of the greatest empires known to history."

"If we turn from the fears of the dead to the aspect of living things we have a picture," he continues, "of a prominent points in which seem to clash with and to contradict one another."

"The British Empire has been an unrespected height of power; it enjoys almost unequalled consideration abroad. London has displaced Paris as the centre of luxury and fashion to which come during the season the rank and wealth of the whole world as once they flocked to Imperial Rome, or at a later date to the Paris of Louis XIV. English is the tongue in daily use in more than half the Royal families of Europe, and English nurses are the earliest teachers of their offspring. Thanks to the provisions of Mr. Cecil Rhodes's will, young men are drawn from distant lands to study at Oxford."

Other countries send forth their scientists, their artists, artisans, and workmen, whilst our most popular peripatetic ambassador today is the dapper of what Professor Huxley once called a sect of Cynics; well meaning, doubtless, but one who has turned the task of feeding, clothing, and rescuing waifs from the horrors of destitution in the richest country in the world into a commercial institution. Our universities and other public bodies can find nobody more worthy of their honorary distinctions than an alien millionaire whose whole activity consists in sowing charity broadcast over the country, thus tending to undermine the sturdy self-reliance of the native population upon which the greatness of England was once based.

"What makes this state of affairs the more remarkable is that England, of all countries in Europe, is the only one which has been mercifully preserved from the ravages of war and invasion which might naturally be supposed to account for the prevalence of wide-spread social misery, poverty, popular unrest, and a pressing demand to reform backward political and social institutions."

"It is customary to assume that the extension of the franchise per se is the sole cause of the present democratic tendency of things. Here the surface aspect blinds us to the more subtle causes that account for recent social changes. The franchise is even now more restricted in England than in any of the leading countries of the continent. Besides, the British instinct of attachment to the upper classes, which acts as an anti-democratic counter-force is still much stronger than in any other country in Europe. As a natural consequence, the House of Commons contains a smaller proportion of direct representatives of the workers than the legislatures of Germany, France, Belgium or Austria. And yet we are faced with an overwhelming wave of democracy of a predatory type."

"Whilst the phenomena of revolutionary changes are in progress in the midst of us, we are being influenced rather hurried on by events which are taking place outside England, and which are attracting attention sporadically, and little understood, are yet destined to exercise a most powerful influence on our fortunes. I refer to the social and intellectual developments which have been in progress on the Continent and in the United States during the last fifty years, and which in their indirect bearing on us cannot but constitute in the long run one of the most striking features of the metamorphosis of England. It is the recent educational progress of other countries, and the aims and ideals of the youth, not of Germany alone, but of the Continent of Europe as a whole, as well as the United States, which have more or less become efficient in economic, scientific, and industrial pursuits, which is indirectly at the root of our restlessness, and which has given birth to our wholesale projects of reform."
