Chase of an English Steamer by the Tuscarora. Our readers may remember that, towards the close of November last, the steamer Thistle, bound from Liverpool to Nassau, was boarded soon after leaving the Funchal Roads, where she had put in to coal, by the Federal cruiser Tuscarora. A passenger on board the Thistle sends the following account of the affair to the Scotsman:—With surrise on Saturday morning, the Thistle got up her steam and her anchor, and, passing between the two war ships (the Tuscarora and H. M. S. Leopard,) dipped her ensign as she passed each. The American took no notice of the compliment; the Englishman did, and dipped his in return. The Thistle had not steamed more than half a mile from her anchorage, every one on board intently watching the American (who had Roads, where she had put in to coal, by the tently watching the American (who had are horrible. kept steam up all night,) when suddenly his chain cable was seen to rush through his kept steam up all night,) when suddenly his chain cable was seen to rush through his hawse holes and he headed in chase of the Thistle. He had slipped the cable, attaching a buoy thereto, that he might save the time necessary to weigh anchor. The Thistle held on her course, and going at full speed, gained rapidly on her pursuer, getting almost beyond range. The Thistle would now be distant more than five miles from Funchal, the American about three miles, though in the fine clear atmosphere the distance did not seem nearly so great. The American, now seeing that he was much inferior in speed, fired a bow gun as a signal for the latter to stop, and Capt. Maxted (of the Thistle,) wishing to be overhauled while he could still claim the protection of the Leopard, obeyed the summons, and hove to. The Yankee bore down at full speed, his ports open and guns run out, while his ports open and sums run out, while his ports open and guns run out, while his ports open and seed of the American about three one mass of faces, as his crew crouded to look at their chase, and possibly to gloat over their prospective prize. When a very short distance from the Thistle, the American and hearding party of two officers and eleven men shoved off. As they neared the Thistle the word Tuscarora was discernible on their documents and his Secretary of State to Masson and Slidell and others in Europe. These despatches give many important facts and details in regard to the condition of the desperate straits to which the rebel leaders are reduced; and, show that unless they can quickly get relief, either by European interference or by dividing the Free States and paralyzing the effect of the Government, they must give up their bad cause for lost. These despatches arrived yesterday. They were put up in a tin box, loading the first of the desperate straits to which the rebel leaders are reduced; and, show that unless they can qui cap-bands, and doubt became a certainty facture and submerge cables connecting all when the first lieutenant of the American the points between Washington and New boarded the Thistle and announced that Orleans, to be paid only on the successful Capt. Maxted having told the lieutenant that his information was erroneous, pointed to the ensign, and said that, as she was a from one British port to another, he would, f necessary, claim the protection of H.M.S. Leopard. The lieutenant (who was apparently a German), with more emphasis than courtesy, expressed his contempt for the flag and protection so invoked, and demanded a sight of the ship's papers, pointing to his crew, and threatening to employ force if necessary; and he declared, if he found there was anything contraband of war on board, he would seize the vessel as a United States prize. Madame Talbot was married in her fourteenth year. She had seventeen children; and, at the time of her death, left the large number of 188 grand-children and great grand-children, all of whom, adds our contemporary, are in easy circumstances.
