SCRAP BOOK POETRY

HARD UP. You're not hard up when your purse is flat. And your trousers frayed like an old door mat; You're not hard up when your bills fall due. And you haven't a dollar to see you through; You're not hard up 'til you see the day That you haven't a cheerful word to say.

You're not hard up when your coin is gone. And you whistle a tune as you journey on; You may walk the streets while others ride. And your pockets have naught but That's not being broke, you may depend, For you're not hard up while you have a friend.

But you are hard up and in sorry way If you haven't a cheerful word to say; If nothing on earth appeals to you. And if you can't see charm in the skies of blue, And you are hard up if you've reached the end, And can say in truth that you have no friend.

In dollars and cents don't count your wealth. But sum it up in good friends and health. In the little tots who call you dad, Who, when you're coming, are, Oh, so glad; If you haven't a soul to love or care, You are hard up, though a millionaire. If you're not hard up when your purse is flat, And your trousers frayed like an old door mat; You're not hard up when your bills fall due. And you haven't a dollar to see you through; You're not hard up 'til you see the day That you haven't a cheerful word to say.

JOHN BROWN.

Execution of the Abolitionist Hero of Harper's Ferry.

Sketch Written by Former Foreman of the Times

(From the Portland Oregonian of October 17).

Yesterday, October 16, marked the 50th anniversary since John Brown, the staunch old abolitionist of Ossawatimie, Kansas, made his memorable stand at Harper's Ferry. His capture, trial and execution at Charlestown, Va., on December 2, the same year, formed the first drops of the storm of civil war which broke, in deadly earnest, little more than a year later, April, 1861.

The death of John Brown, stirred deeply the sympathizers with the anti-slavery cause. The following article, which was widely reproduced, was written at that time by George M. Cornwall, then connected with the Evening Times, of Hamilton, Canada.

Old Ossawatimie Brown has now passed that bourne whence no traveller returns, and his human eye can pierce that veil which hides from us his track in the invisible world, whither his spirit has entered. He went on this, his long, last journey, all alone—his sons and many of his followers have gone on before and now their chief begins his death march in lonely solitude. What were his feelings on entering the dark land of shades—or what emotions filled his mind on entering the spirit land, is far beyond the ken of mortal. We only know his manly voice awakes no more the echoes of the west, by mountain stream or dark-wood shade—that his lion heart has ceased to beat, and now lies still and cold—that the eagle glance of his eye has had its untamable fire quenched in the mists and darkness of death—that his once-firm right hand is now nerveless and unclenped, and will draw blade of steel, or rifle-trigger, in freedom's cause no more, and that his iron form itself will soon dissolve and molder into dust, and leave not a wreck behind. More than this is all left to endless conjecture, different as the mind of Brown on the eventful life and tragically mournful death of old Ossawatimie Brown.

Great differences of opinion have been expressed as to his motives and character. By one party he is represented as a fierce, restless, turbulent spirit, delighting in bloodshed, and rapine, and consequently, regard his execution as but a slight atonement to society for her laws defied and outraged, and her citizens slain—and consider his calmness and composure as only an evidence of hardened guilt and an insensible, unfeeling nature—and his religious sentiments, as expressed in prison, as mere pretence and hypocritical cant. A second party regard him as an unfortunate monomaniac, whose mind had lost its equilibrium from the wrongs inflicted on him and his family in the border strife between the Kansas settlers and the pro-slavery Missourians, and the cruel sufferings which he and they endured in these sanguinary struggles—and, consequently, as more deserving of pity than blame. A third party regard him as a martyr of the cause of freedom, and his losses and sufferings as very favorable to the cause of composure as the effect of a consciousness of moral rectitude and an improving conscience. It was hoped by many that the death sentence would have been commuted into imprisonment for life, and many things were said in praise of the magnanimity of the South, which it seems need not have been said, but such a hope was seen to be illusive, as Governor Wise personally took the trouble one day to assure the prisoners that they must prepare to die on the day fixed by the judge on their trial. A very general feeling of pity and admiration seems to have seized the minds of those who witnessed the dauntless bearing of the old man when on his trial, and who, in answer to the question by his judge as to whether he had aught to say in his own behalf before the sentence of death should be pronounced, expressed in a few words the all he had to say in such a calm, manly and yet simple way, that when sentence of death was passed, one can only, was heard to express one's feeling of satisfaction at the determination of his trial. Rumors from various quarters spoke of attempts to be made to rescue him and his followers from their impending fate; but Governor Wise and his friends seem to have taken such precautions as to render this impossible. The old man, under all his sad calamities, preserved a singularly calm and unperurbed spirit, under a firm conviction that his life was sacrificed in a just cause, and he forfeited it without a murmur, believing that his fate will advance the cause for which he dies, and that those for whom he risked his own and his followers' lives and liberty will yet reap the advantage of his loss, when he sleeps the sleep of death. Though it is affirmed by many that his life was sustained by grimaces—that he shed blood unnecessarily—and that the moving principle in his mind was revenge; and though his attempt at Harper's Ferry was ill-planned and ill-timed—though in this, his last exploit, the lives of several were sacrificed apparently without necessity, and without having anything directly to do with the principle involved in the struggle—we are yet led to think, whatever loss of life may have been consequent upon the affair at Harper's Ferry, we are persuaded after all that John Brown cannot, in justice, be held responsible personally for these much to be lamented occurrences, but imagine that his over-zealous and excited followers had in their frenzy taken little time to coolly discriminate between opponents and uninterested spectators; and that any unprejudiced mind—we are compelled to admit, under all these circumstances, that we believe John Brown was sincere and honest in profession, and that he acted as he did either from a conviction of duty, or impelled by feelings of sympathy for the class whose cause he espoused so warmly, and adhered to through good and ill fortune so unconsciously. When one thinks of the system which John Brown strove to overturn—the harrowing details of which are revolting and distressing to such a degree as to induce sensitive minds in general to turn from the sickening spectacle with loathing and disgust—it is not to be wondered at that he threw his own and his followers' lives and fortunes into the dark gulf, in the hope of bridging the abyss which separates the lot of the slave from that of the free man, and had his sagacity been but equal to his courage he would, without doubt, have accomplished his benevolent object, as it was when he found that success was denied, we find him unflinchingly accepting the awful alternative without regret and without alarm. True as steel to his principles, we neither find him uttering a craven cry for pity or pardon, nor imploring maledictions to fall on the most merciless of his enemies; but his words and features were calm, placid and martyr-like to the last.

From a private letter from Mr. Cornwall's daughter it is learned that the above article first appeared in the Times fifty years ago. Mr. Cornwall is now in Los Angeles, is in his 83rd year, and enjoys remarkably good health.

NAVY'S HEAD.

King Approves of Appointment of Sir Arthur Wilson.

The New Sea Lord Said to be a Great Strategist.

London, Dec. 1.—King Edward to-day approved the appointment of Admiral Sir Arthur Wilson, commanding the British Channel squadron, as first sea lord, to succeed Admiral Fisher, who was recently elevated to the peerage and who will retire from the Admiralty on Jan. 25th.

The choice of a new first sea lord is always attended. The number of men qualified for the post may be reckoned on fewer than the fingers of one hand. He must have a will of iron, a clear thinking brain, mastery of all naval problems of past, present and to come, and, above all, he must be able not only to win the confidence of statesmen on both sides in politics, but he must steadfastly hold his own in the council chamber with the most expert parliamentary debaters of the time.

These are the reasons why the appointment of Sir A. Wilson, V. C., is absolutely the best possible choice.

Sir Arthur Wilson's mind is virile and independent. He is as hard a worker as Lord Fisher. Being unobscured by fatigue, at 68 years of age, his stamina is a marvel. Scorning flattery, the allurement of luxury—except flowers—he sits the limelight. It is credited to the navy with a dislike to the press and of journalists bordering upon abhorrence.

During his long struggle with the Atlantic Ocean for the body of H. M. S. Montagu scarcely a word leaked into the papers about the
