DUCKWORTH STREET & QUEEN'S ROAD.

ing bakery. So short was the distance that he went without his hat. As he did not return the country was scoured for him, but without result.

Twenty years later a man entered the hotel, made his way into the bar parlor, and laid a penny roll before the very landlady who had originally sent him forth. It was the remark: "I've been a long time, ma'am, but it wasn't my fault." He had met the press gang, and had been hustled off to sea.

A party of undergraduates, passing through London as "the shortest way home," went to the theatre and arranged to wind up the evening at a supper house in Covent Garden. One of them went to see a lady into her brougham, promising to return "in a moment." That "moment" extended to thirty years. At the end of that period a "bronzed and bearded stranger" walked into an Oxfordshire rectory just as the family was finishing breakfast and coolly ordered a fresh supply for himself. He was the missing man.

His explanation was remarkable. On leaving his companions, he met a school chum who was going to catch the boat-train en route for the Cape. On the whim of the moment he made up his mind to go with him. In South Africa he turned farmer and prospered, and explained that he did not write home to tell of his whereabouts because "letter-writing was such a fag."

What Some Dogs Can Do

In connection with an article on the subject of intelligence of dogs in a London paper, several readers of that paper have sent in stories telling what their dogs can do. Among them is Mr. R. Gold, of Brechin, who writes as follows:

"I was visiting a friend who lives in the country, and was getting quite chummy with a little fox terrier which belonged to him. When my friend asked me if I had seen a dog-an-gler, on my replying in the negative, he said to the terrier, 'Lassie, we could do with some trout.'"

"Away she trotted, and in a minute or two we followed, making our way to the mill-stream. On arriving there I was astonished to see four fine trout lying on the bank, whilst the dog was in the stream looking for more. She took six others in about four or five minutes, then at a word from her owner desisted. She never marked the fish with her teeth, as she did not kill them. The only occasion when she killed was when she was hidden to catch one for her friend, the cat."

Another reader (Mr. J. G. Pawson, Fritwell) writes:

"One of the finest examples of intelligence in his knowledge of motor cars. I am the owner of a certain make of car. I have sounded myooter quite half a mile away from home and he has known it at once and run to meet me."

"If a car of the same make should pass the house he is up and out in a minute, but takes no notice of any other type. He knows the sound of the engine and can distinguish it from others."

Of the Swansea Town Football Club's for terrier, Mr. E. S. Edwards, the team's trainer, writes:

"He will imitate skipping and go through body exercises like a human being. At ball practice he will head the ball to the players, dribble with them, and join in an attacking movement, placing the ball in the net and then taking it to the centre of the field for the same to start again."

"He can box like a kangaroo, and knows the players individually."

The Dog Detective.
"In a draper's shop in Lochgilphead, in Argyllshire," writes Mr. J. Stewart, of Murthly, "I once saw a black Scotch terrier which did the most extraordinary tricks."

"The proprietor, seeing I was interested, consented to give a demonstration." Shutting the dog in a room, my friend and I collected about five shillings (almost 50 cents) in coppers, and allowing his master to handle one, we placed it in the centre of the pile on the floor. When the dog was allowed in he was told to look for the last penny. After sniffing about and finding the pile, he scattered the coins and took the marked one to his master.

"As a further test, the dog was shut in the shop while we went outside. His master, taking another coin which we noted, threw it into a grass plot. The dog was then brought out. He went off sniffing the air, and in less than five minutes came back and laid the penny at his master's feet."

"My cousin," writes Mr. D. Jones, of Waverley, "had a sheep dog named Rover, who would call his master at five o'clock in the morning and then wait for instructions. He has told to take the sheep numbering over one hundred, to a certain field over a mile away, and to bring back the cows from another field for milking."

"Rover, after breakfast, would bring what horses were required from the fields to the farm to be harnessed, one of the boys being sent to open any gates which were known to be fastened."

"At the end of the day, Rover would be sent to bring back the sheep. The farmer would count them up, and if one was missing he would say to Rover that a certain sheep, calling it by name, was absent. Rover would go back and return with the stray one."

A Bird Robber and Murderer

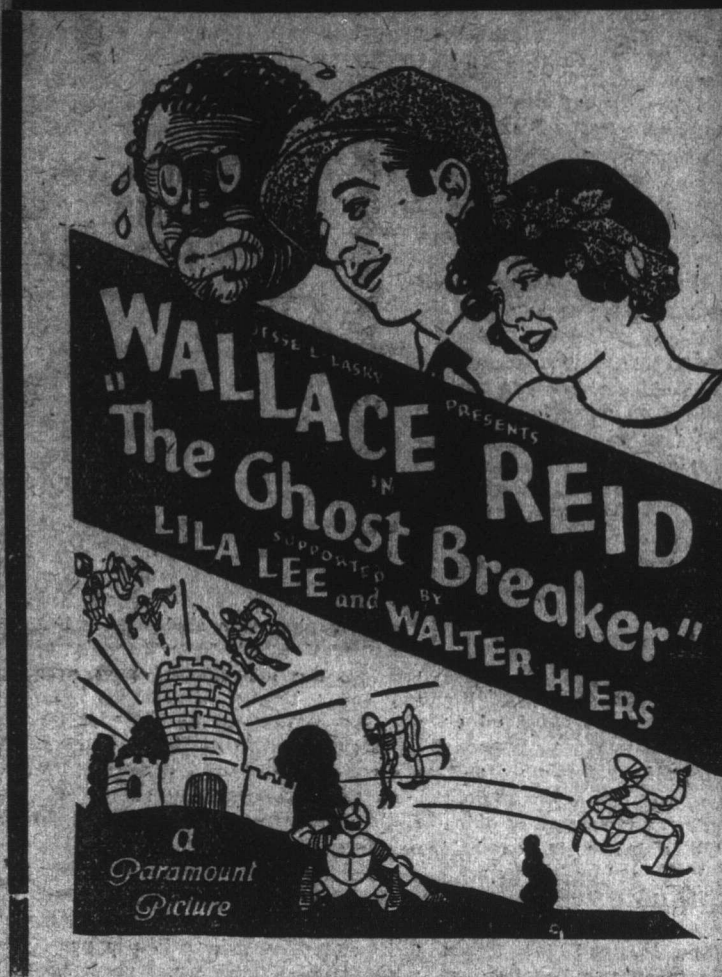

We have two species of black-backed gull—the Great and the Lesser, though there is not a pin's point to choose between them in the matter of their bewitchingly spick-and-span appearance, writes W. P. Fyfe, in a London paper. Immaculately white, save for the slaty black of the back and wings, you may distinguish between them by the fact that the Great Black-backed affects flesh-colored hose, his smaller relative a pale yellow; for the test of size is only possible where the two can be seen standing side by side, and this opportunity does not often occur. A further touch of color is added by the pale yellow beak, with a spot of vermilion red on the angle of the lower jaw and lemon-yellow eyes.

The wild, querulous cries of these birds, their majestic flight add not a little to the grandeur which is inseparable from their chosen haunts. In their first plumage these birds present a very different appearance. For then this is of a mottled, greyish-brown, on a paler ground, while the beak is of a dusky hue, the eyes dark brown, and the legs of a dull flesh color. It takes four years to attain to the splendors of the adult dress.

But while these birds are a delight to the eye, their mode of life is not beyond reproach. The Great Black-backed gull, indeed, has been described as a "robber and a murderer." These are hard words, but it must be admitted that they are true, wherever opportunity offers.

During the breeding season he levies a heavy toll on the eggs of guillemots and razor-bills; while, later, he works havoc among the nestings. He will keep patient watch by the burrows of puffins and shearwaters, to seize upon their occupants, whether young or old, as they emerge, and small chance of escape is theirs if he once gets a good grip. For the rest of the year nothing, in the way of animal food, comes amiss to him.

When hanging small on the over doors or windows, use narrow slats. To remove very stubborn screws, tops from bottles and jars, use a nut cracker.

The Peal of Wedding Bells

Does it not bring visions of the day when your own little girl will be a blushing bride? And don't you hope that when she marries, "Daddy's Gift" will be such as will add much to her happiness?

Well then, why not commence now to provide for her dowry by means of an Imperial Endowment Policy on your life? You'll scarcely miss the small yearly savings required to maintain it.

In this way you can make sure of having available when she reaches a marriageable age any sum you may choose. And, if you should die in the meantime, the full amount of the policy will be paid to her or to her guardian immediately.

We'll tell you all about Imperial Endowments if you'll send us your name and address. And your asking for the information will not place you under any obligation whatever.

Field Marshall's 'Crimes'

Field-Marshal Sir William Robertson, in speaking recently to a London writer of his early days in the British army—he joined up as a private when seventeen years old—confessed that his first "crime" was letting a prisoner go, his second letting a horse go, and then at Brighton, at a Volunteer review, a man who was under his charge refreshed himself too freely and his horse go, now you let a man and horse go. The Colonel then said to young Robertson: "I am getting sick of you; first you let a man go, then you let a

Ancient Well Discovered

It has been satisfactorily proven that the ancient well recently discovered at Clerkenwell, London, is really the old monastic well as originally believed. The relic is to be preserved in the basement of the warehouse where it was unearthed, in the same way that the Roman well in the Strand is preserved. The best reference to the well is in Stowe's "Survey of London" (1598), wherein it seems the well was used by the brothers of St. John and the Benedictine Nuns in the adjoining convent. In 1870 the Earl of Northampton gave it for the use of the poor of St. James's parish. Later it was used for brewing beer.
